Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 19, 1641.

3†. Bearing; behavior.

She had so stedfaste countenaunce,
So noble porte and meyntenaunce.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 834.

For all their craft is in their countenaunce,
They bene so grave and full of mayntenaunce.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

4. In law: (a) An officious intermeddling in a suit in which the meddler has no interest, by assisting either party with means to prosecute or defend it. This is a punishable offense at common law. (b) Formerly, a like intermeddling with the controversy of others, as to land, by wrongfully taking or holding possession in aid of one party. (c) In a more general sense, an interfering with the due course of justice.

J. F. Stephen.—Cap of maintenance, a cap of dignity carried before the sovereigns of England at their coronation; a kind of abacot or bycocket. The term is also applied to an ornament borne before the mayors of certain cities on state occasions. In heraldry it is in use as a symbol of dignity, and is occasionally shown beneath the crest in place of the customary wreath. The cap of maintenance (or estate) originally belonged to nobles exclusively, but is now granted to gentlemen, and is borne irrespective of rank.

Cap of Maintenance.

In the later end of thys yere came the thyrde cappe of mayntenaunce from the pope.
Fabyan, Chron., I., an. 1506.

=Syn. 1. Justification, preservation.—2. Subsistence, Livelihood, etc. See living.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 4172.

Maitland cord. See cord[1].

maître (mā'tr), n. [F.: see master[1].] A master.—A la maître d'hôtel, in cookery, a phrase signifying that a dish is served with a sauce made of butter melted with a little lemon-juice, vinegar, and chopped parsley.—Maître de chapelle, a choir-master. See ma trise.—Maître d'hôtel, the master or superintendent of the table in a mansion; a butler.

maîtrise (mā-trēz'), n. [F.: see maistrise.] 1. In France, a school formerly attached to a cathedral or collegiate church, for the education of singers. The pupils were supported at the expense of the church, and educated in other branches as well as music. Most French musicians were educated in these schools before the Revolution, when they were suppressed. Some were afterward reëstablished, and a few still exist. The master of such a school is called the maître de chapelle.

2. Formerly, in France, a corporation of masters in a trade; a trade-gild.

The Parisian couturières, prior to the Revolution, were continually persecuted by the maîtrise or corporation of women's tailors. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 288.

★maize (māz), n. [Formerly also maiz, mais, mayz, mays; = F. maïs, formerly maiz, < Sp. maiz (NL. mays), < W. Ind. (Haytian) mahiz, mahis, the native name of the plant. It was also formerly called Turkey corn or Turkey wheat, after F. blé de Turquie, its origin, like that of the Turkey cock or turkey, being at one time erroneously ascribed vaguely to "Turkey" or the East.] 1. A cereal plant, Zea Mays, of the grass family; the Indian corn. In America commonly called simply corn; in Europe formerly Turkey corn or Turkey wheat. For description, see Zea and ★maize, 1 (in supplement).

2. The grain produced by the maize; Indian corn. It appears in market either in the ear (i. e., on the cob) or shelled (i. e., removed from the cob). It is a highly nutritious food, starchy matter predominating in it. As human food it is used in various forms. (See corn-bread, hasty-pudding, Indian meal, hominy, corn-starch, samp.) The immature kernels (green corn), boiled, form an excellent vegetable, and in this state maize is largely preserved by canning. Of late years Indian corn has been extensively manufactured into glucose. Maize is said to furnish food to a larger part of the human race than any other grain except rice. It is also much used for fattening cattle and swine, as well as for horses. An enormous amount is consumed in the manufacture of spirits; it is the principal grain distilled in the United States. Maize was found in cultivation over a great part of America on its discovery, and was rapidly diffused throughout the world wherever the climate was suitable to it.

Heer, of one grain of Maiz, a Reed doth spring
That thrice a year flue hundred grains doth bring.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

3. A coal-tar color, the sodium salt of the disulphonic acid of azoxy-stilbene. It dyes silk and wool reddish-yellow in an acid bath. Also called sun-yellow.—Japan maize, a variety with ornamental variegated leaves.—Mountain maize, plants of the genus Ombrophytum, said to be eaten like mushrooms.—Water-maize, the royal water-lily, Victoria Amazonica (regia); so called from its farinaceous seeds.

maize-bird (māz'bėrd), n. An American blackbird of the family Icteridæ and subfamily Agelæinæ; one of the troopials or marsh-blackbirds: so called from its fondness for Indian corn.

maize-oil (māz′oil), n. An oil prepared from the seed of Indian corn. It is a limpid yellow oil, said to be a good lubricant, but it has not yet been produced cheaply and in considerable quantity.

maize-smut (māz′smut), n. A destructive fungus, Ustilago Zeæ, attacking the ovary as well as various other parts of the living plant of Indian corn.

maize-thief (māz′thēf), n. A maize-bird; especially, the common marsh-blackbird, Agelæus phœniceus. A. Wilson.

Maj. An abbreviation of Major before a name.

Majaqueus (ma-jā′kwē-us), n. [NL.] A genus of very large sooty shearwaters, of the family Procellariidæ. The bill and feet are robust, the nasal tubes long, and the wings and tail very short; the plumage is fuliginous, with white markings on the head. Two species, M. æquinoctialis and M. conspicillatus, inhabit southern seas. Reichenbach, 1850.

majestatic† (maj-es-tat′ik), a. [= Pg. magestatico, majestatico (cf. G. majestätisch = Dan. majestætisk = Sw. majestätisk), < ML. majestaticus*, < L. majesta(t-)s, majesty: see majesty.] Of majestic appearance; majestic.

majestatical† (maj-es-tat′i-kal), a. [< majestatic + -al.] Same as majestatic.

majestic (mą-jes′tik), a. [< majesty + -ic. Cf. majestatic.] 1. Possessing majesty; having dignity of nature or appearance; of stately character; august.

> Here his first lays majestic Denham sung.
> Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 271.

2. Characteristic of or manifesting majesty; lofty; grand; sublime: as, a majestic mien.

> Get the start of the majestic world.
> Shak., J. C., i. 2. 130.
>
> Look how she walks along yon shady space;
> Not Juno moves with more majestic grace.
> Dryden, Pal. and Arc., i. 260.

=Syn. Majestic, August, Stately; magnificent, imperial, regal, royal, noble. Stately is generally applied to the merely external, and sometimes to the wholly artificial: as, a stately etiquette. The majestic and august are natural, majestic applying to the appearance, august to the character, while stately often applies to motion: as, a stately walk. August, as applied to persons, implies respect combined with awe on the part of the beholder: as, George Washington is the most august personage in American history. See grand.

majestical (mą-jes′ti-kal), a. [< majestic + -al.] Majestic.

> If I were ever to fall in love again . . . it would be, I think, with prettiness, rather than with majestical beauty.
> Cowley, Greatness.

majestically (mą-jes′ti-kal-i), adv. In a majestic manner; with majesty; with a lofty air or appearance.

majesticalness (mą-jes′ti-kal-nes), n. The character of being majestic. [Rare.]

majesticness (mą-jes′tik-nes), n. The quality of being majestic. Cartwright, To the Countess of Carlisle. [Rare.]

majesty (maj′es-ti), n.; pl. majesties (-tiz). [< ME. magestee, < OF. majestet, F. majesté = Sp. majestad = Pg. magestade, majestade = It. maestà, maestà = D. majesteit = G. Sw. majestät = Dan. majestæt, < L. majesta(t-)s, greatness, grandeur, dignity, majesty, < majus (major-, orig. majos-*; cf. honestus, honest, < honor, honos, honor), compar. (cf. magis, compar. adv.) of magnus, or rather of the rare positive majus, great: see magnitude, main[2], major, etc.] 1. The greatness or grandeur of exalted rank or character, or of manner; imposing loftiness; stateliness; in general, the character of inspiring awe or reverence.

> And aftir that, zit scholde he putten hem in a fayrere Paradys, where that thei schold see God of Nature visibly, in his Magestee and in his Blisse.
> Mandeville, Travels, p. 279.
>
> The Lord reigneth, he is clothed with majesty.
> Ps. xciii. i.
>
> Awed by the majesty of Antiquity, turn not with indifference from the Future. Sumner, Orations, I. 196.
>
> Girlish lightness passed away
> Into a sweet grave majesty,
> That scarce elsewhere the world might see.
> William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 67.

2. Royal state; royalty.

> Wipe off the dust that hides our sceptre's gilt,
> And make high majesty look like itself.
> Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 295.

3. A title of address or dignity (commonly written with a capital) used in speaking to or of a ruling sovereign or his (or more rarely her) wedded consort: as, your Majesty or Majesties; their majesties the king and queen. By papal grant, the sovereigns of Spain bear the title of Catholic Majesty; those of Portugal, of Most Faithful Majesty; and the former kings of France had that of Most Christian Majesty.

> Before she arriued at London, Captaine Smith, to deserue her former couretesies, made her qualities knowne to the Queenes most excellent Maiestie and her Court.
> Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 29.
>
> Most royal majesty,
> I crave no more than hath your highness offer'd.
> Shak., Lear, i. 1. 196.

4. [cap.] In medieval art, etc., a symbolic representation of the first person of the Trinity, seated on a throne. In the art of the Western Church this figure is usually robed in a cope and other vestments, wearing, as emblematic of sovereignty over the whole universe, a triple (sometimes a quadruple) crown similar to the papal tiara, and holding the mound or globe of kingly authority.

> The dome [of St. Sophia at Constantinople] was covered with mosaic of glass: the summit, as usual, representing a Majesty. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 238.

5. In medieval English usage, the canopy of a hearse: so called because generally adorned with the symbolic figure of God the Father, called the Majesty. See hearse.

> This tester-like covering was known as the majesty.
> Rock, Church of our Fathers, ii. 497.

6. In her., a representation of an eagle as crowned with a regal crown and holding a scepter.—Apostolic Majesty. See apostolic king, under apostolic.

majestyship (maj′es-ti-ship), n. [< majesty + -ship.] Majesty. [Rare.]

> And please your majestiship.
> Greene, Looking-glass for London and England.

Maj.-Gen. An abbreviation of Major-General, used before a name.

majoe-bitter (mā′jō-bit″ėr), n. A bitter shrub of the West Indies, Tariri Antidesma (Picramnia Antidesma of Swartz), used medicinally.

majolica (ma-jol′i-kä; It. pron. mä-yō′li-kä), n. [< Maiolica, for Majorca (Sp. Mallorca), whence the first specimens came.] 1. Decorative enameled pottery, especially that of Italy from the fifteenth to the seventeenth century. The name is applied particularly to the more richly adorned pieces, the colors of which have remarkable intensity. (See mezza-majolica). Modern writers on ceramics have attempted to limit it to lustered pottery, especially that of the middle ages and the sixteenth century, made in Majorca or in Spain, or more especially in Italy, in supposed imitation of ware from the two former countries.

Majolica Pesaro Ware of about A. D. 1510.

2. As applied to modern pottery, a kind of ware which in effects of color partly imitates the pottery above defined, especially in large pieces used for architectural decoration, garden-seats, vases, etc. This ware is usually much harder and more perfectly manufactured than the ancient, but is inferior in decorative effect, being cast in molds and having a mechanical look.—Fontana majolica, a variety of the majolica of Urbino, the name Fontana having been adopted by certain of the leading decorators of that school. The painter known as Orazio Fontana is the most celebrated of these; his work takes rank among the finest productions of the sixteenth century.

major (mā′jor), a. and n. [I. a. = OF. maior, major, majour, majeur, F. majeur = Sp. mayor = Pg. maior, mayor, major = It. maggiore, < L. major, greater, compar. of magnus, great: see magnitude and majesty. II. n. = D. G. Dan. Sw. major, < F. major = Sp. mayor = Pg. major = It. maggiore, < L. major, an elder, adult (usually in pl.), ML. also chief officer, chief, mayor (cf. mayor, from the same source); from the adj.] I. a. 1. Greater; more important or effective; first in force or consideration; leading; principal: as, the major premise or term of a syllogism.

> My major vow lies here; this I'll obey.
> Shak., T. and C., v. 1. 49.

2. Greater in quantity, number, or extent: as, the major part of the revenue, of an assembly, or of a territory.

> In any rank or profession whatever, the more general or major part of opinion goes with the face.
> B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

The first eight lines of this Italian sonnet are often called the major portion. Lanier, Science of Eng. Verse, p. 241.

3†. Of age; having attained to majority. Godwin.—4. In music: (a) Of intervals, standard or normal; literally "greater," as compared with minor intervals. The term is more often applied to seconds, thirds, sixths, sevenths, and ninths, designating an interval equivalent to the intervals between the key-note of a standard or normal scale and its second, third, sixth, seventh, and ninth tone respectively. Thus, a major second is two semitones long, a major third four semitones, a major sixth nine semitones, and a major seventh eleven semitones. Major has also been applied of late to fourths, fifths, and octaves, and is then equivalent to the older term perfect. Finally, it is used to distinguish the larger of two intervals that differ by a minute quantity: as, a major step or tone (𝅗𝅥), which is a comma greater than a minor tone. Opposed to minor, and also often to diminished and augmented. See interval, 5. (b) Of tones, distant by a major interval from a given tone: as, A is the major third of F, etc. (c) Of tonalities and scales, standard or normal: characterized by a major third and also by a major sixth and seventh: opposed to minor. The major tonality or scale is the recognized standard of reference for all the modern musical systems. See key, tonality, and scale. (d) Of triads and chords, characterized by a major third between the root and the tone next above, and a perfect fifth between the root and the second tone above: opposed to minor, diminished, and augmented. The major triad is the usual standard of reference in classifying the chords of modern music. See triad and chord. (e) Of cadences, ending in a major triad. (f) Of modes in the modern sense, and thus of composition in general, characterized by the use of a major tonality and of major cadences: as, a piece is written throughout in the major mode. From an acoustical point of view, major intervals, chords, and scales are simpler and stronger in themselves and admit of better harmonic extension and combination than minor. The educated taste of modern times has tended to exalt the major over the minor, making the former the standard and normal of which the latter is the variation; while the medieval systems, being based upon a different conception of music at various points, tended the other way. The esthetic effect of the major in contrast with the minor is brighter, stronger, and more complete. It has recently been maintained that major and minor phenomena, in all their phases, are mutually reciprocal, the major triad, scale, etc., being measured upward in a certain way from a given tone, and the minor triad, scale, etc., being measured downward in th same way from the same tone. According to this view, the major triad of C is called the over-chord of C, and the minor triad of F is called the under-chord of C, etc.

5. In logic, wider; broader; more extensive; a predicate to more subjects. The major extreme or major term of a syllogism is that term which enters into the predicate of the conclusion; the major premise is that premise which contains the major term. These have always been the usual definitions, but they have been subject to much dispute, owing to the fact that all real distinction between major and minor vanishes in certain cases. —Bob major. See bob[1], 7.—Major axis. Same as transverse axis (which see, under axis[1]).—Major function. See function.

II. n. 1. Milit., an officer next in rank above a captain and below a lieutenant-colonel; the lowest field-officer. The proper command of a major is a battalion of infantry or artillery or a squadron of cavalry. Commonly abbreviated Maj.

2. In law, a person who is old enough to manage his own concerns. See age, n., 3.—3. In music, the major mode, or a major tonality or major chord, taken absolutely.—4. In logic: (a) The major premise of a syllogism, which in direct syllogisms states the rule from which the conclusion is drawn. (b) The major extreme of a syllogism.—5†. Same as mayor. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 7.

major (mā′jor), v. i. [< major, n., 1.] To act the major; look and talk big, or with a military air. [Rare.]

> Can it be for the puir body M'Durk's health to major about in the tartans like a tobacconist's sign in a frosty morning, wi' his poor wizzened houghs as blue as a blawort? Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xx.

majoralty† (mā′jor-al-ti), n. [See mayoralty.] Same as mayoralty.

> The majoralty of Sir John Dethick, Knight.
> Maxon (1659), quoted in Encyc. Brit., IX. 486.

majorat (ma-zhō-rä′), n. [F.: see majorate[1].] 1. The right of succession to property according to age; primogeniture: so called in some of the countries of Europe.—2. In France, property, landed or funded, which might be reserved by persons holding hereditary titles, and attached to the title so as to descend with it inalienably. This principle was abolished in the first revolution, restored by Napoleon I., restricted under Louis Philippe, and finally abolished in 1849.

majorate[1]† (mā′jor-āt), v. t. [< ML. majorare, make greater, increase, < L. major, greater: see major, a., and -ate[2].] To increase. Howell, Parly of Beasts.

majorate[2] (mā′jor-āt), n. [= F. majorat, < ML. majoratus, < L. major, greater, elder: see major, n., and -ate[3].] The office or rank of major; majority; majorship. [Rare.]

majoration† (mā-jō-rā′shon), n. [< ML. majoratio(n-), < majorare, make greater: see majorate.] Increase; enlargement.

But majoration, which is also the work of refraction, appeareth plainly in sounds. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 254.

Majorcan (mā-jôr'kan), a. and n. [< Majorca (see def.) (Sp. Mallorca) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Majorca, the largest of the Balearic Islands, in the Mediterranean, belonging to Spain.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of the island of Majorca. Also Mallorcan.

★majordomo (mā-jor-dō'mō), n. [= F. majordome = It. maggiordomo, < Sp. mayordomo = Pg. mordomo, maiordomo, < ML. major domus, a house-steward: L. major, elder, ML. chief (see mayor); domus, gen. of domus, a house: see dome[1].] A man employed to superintend the management of a household, especially that of a sovereign or other dignitary keeping a great establishment; a house-steward. In former times the majordomo of a royal household was commonly an officer of high rank and influence, often charged with important ministerial duties in affairs of government. See mayor of the palace, under mayor.

He took the ceremony which he found ready in the custom of the Jews, where the major-domo, after the paschal supper, gave bread and wine to every person of his family. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 116.

The King's personal favorite and attendant, his "dapifer," "pincerna," major domus, or something of the kind. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, II. 441.

major-general (mā'jor-jen'e-ral), n. A military officer next in rank below a lieutenant-general. In the United States army the proper command of a major-general is a division, also called an infantry or cavalry division; in the past, however, major-generals have commanded both army corps and entire armies. In the British and German armies major-generals are the lowest permanent general officers (brigadiers in the former being temporarily appointed), and in action usually command brigades. Abbreviated Maj.-Gen.

Majorist (mā'jor-ist), n. [< Major (see def.) + -ist.] A follower of Georg Major, a German Protestant theologian (1502–74), who maintained that good works are necessary for salvation.

Majoristic (mā-jo-ris'tik), a. [< Majorist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Majorists or to their doctrines.—Majoristic controversy, a controversy which began in 1551–2 between Georg Major and Nikolaus von Amsdorf, in regard to the doctrine of justification by faith. Major maintained that good works are essential to salvation, and Amsdorf was accused of believing that they are a hindrance to salvation. The controversy continued till the adoption of the Formula of Concord in 1577.

majority (mā-jor'i-ti), n.; pl. majorities (-tiz). [= F. majorité = Sp. mayoridad = Pg. maioridade = It. maggiorità, < ML. majorita(t-)s, < L. major, greater: see major and -ity.] 1†. The state of being major or greater; superiority; preponderance.

Douglas, whose high deeds,
Whose hot incursions, and great name in arms,
Holds from all soldiers chief majority.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 2. 109.

2. The greater number; more than half the whole number: as, a majority of mankind; a majority of votes. See plurality.

After all, it is my principle that the will of the majority should prevail. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 276.

3. The excess of one of two groups of things which have been enumerated over the other: as, the measure was carried by a majority of twenty votes; his majority was two to one.—4. Full age; the age at which the laws of a country permit a young person to manage his own affairs and to exercise the rights of citizenship—in most countries twenty-one years. The majority of a reigning prince usually occurs much earlier; in France it used to be at fourteen years. See age, n., 3.

This prince [Henry III.] was no sooner come to his majority but the baron raised a cruel war against him. Sir J. Davies, State of Ireland.

5. The office, rank, or commission of a major.

Soon after his marriage Thompson became acquainted with Governor Wentworth of New Hampshire, who, struck by his appearance and bearing, conferred on him the majority of a local regiment of militia. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 309.

6†. [L. majores.] Ancestors; ancestry.

A posterity not unlike their majority. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

The majority, the great majority, the dead.—To go over to or to join the majority, to join the dead or departed; die.

majorship (mā'jor-ship), n. [< major + -ship.] The office or rank of major; majority.

majoun, madjoun, n. See majun.

majun (ma-jön'), n. [Also majoon, majoun, madjoun, majum; Turk. ma'jūn, paste, putty, cement, electuary, a kind of taffy or preparation of sugar with spices.] A green-colored intoxicating confection, commonly sold in the bazaars of India. The chief ingredients used in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, ghee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (Datura), the powder of Nux vomica, and sugar. Qanoon-e-Islam, Glos. lxxxiii. Malacodermi (mal″a-kō-dėr′mī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + δέρμα, skin: see derma.] In Latreille's classification, the second section of serricorn pentamerous Coleoptera. It is composed of beetles having, for the most part, soft flexible bodies, like the glow-worm, the head received into the thorax or at least covered by it at the base, and the prosternum not produced in front and usually not pointed behind. The malacoderms were divided by Latreille into five tribes, Cebrionites, Lampyrides, Melyrides, Clerii, and Ptinides. Although the term is literally inapplicable to a large number of the beetles so called, it is retained as one division of Serricornia, the other being Sternoxi.

Malacodermidæ (mal″a-kō-dėr′mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Malacodermi + -idæ.] A family of Malacodermi, containing beetles which are really soft-bodied, as the glow-worms. Also called Lampyridæ and Telephoridæ. It corresponds to Latreille's second tribe, Lampyrides.

malacoid (mal′a-koid), a. [< Gr. μαλακοειδής, of a soft nature, < μαλακός, soft, + εἶδος, form.] Soft in texture; soft-bodied; having a mucilaginous texture: applied to parts of plants, particularly the hyphæ of certain fungi.

malacolite (mal′a-kō-līt), n. [F. malacolithe, < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + λίθος, stone: it is softer than the associated minerals.] Diopside; a lime-magnesia variety of pyroxene, of a pale greenish-white color.

malacological (mal″a-kō-loj′i-kal), a. [< malacology + -ical.] Of or pertaining to malacology; conchological.

malacologist (mal-a-kol′ō-jist), n. [< malacology + -ist.] One who is versed in malacology; a student of mollusks.

malacology (mal-a-kol′ō-ji), n. [= F. malacologie; < Gr. μαλακός, soft (> μαλάκια, soft-bodied animals without external shells or articulated bones: cf. mollusk), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of the molluscous or soft-bodied animals; the knowledge of shellfish. It is synonymous with conchology, but implies that attention is paid to the soft parts, or anatomical structure of the animals, rather than to their shells.

malacon (mal′a-kon), n. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft.] In mineral., an altered and somewhat hydrated zircon, having a hardness inferior to that of the original mineral.

Malaconotinæ (mal″a-kō-nō-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Malaconotus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Old World and chiefly African shrikes, of the family Laniidæ, named from the genus Malaconotus. J. Cabanis, 1850. Also Malaconoti.

malaconotine (mal″ą-kō-nō′tin), a. Of or pertaining to the Malaconotinæ.

Malaconotus (mal″ą-kō-nō′tus), n. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + νῶτος, back.] A genus of African shrikes, giving name to the subfamily Malaconotinæ: so named from the soft plumage of the back. W. Swainson, 1827.

Malacopoda (mal-ą-kop′ō-dą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of malacopus: see malacopodous.] A name given by E. R. Lankester to a grade of Gnathopoda (or Arthropoda) containing only the class Peripatidea, which itself consists of the single genus Peripatus, thus contrasted with a grade or series Condylopoda, including all other crustaceans, insects, etc.

malacopodous (mal-ą-kop′ō-dus), a. [< NL. malacopus (-pod-), < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] Having soft feet; specifically, of or pertaining to the Malacopoda.

Malacopteri (mal-ą-kop′tę-rī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of malacopterus, soft-finned: see malacopterous.] In Johannes Müller's classification of fishes, an order of teleost fishes characterized by fin-rays that are soft, jointed, and generally branched, by abdominal ventral fins, and by the persistent communication between the air-bladder and the intestine. It corresponds nearly to the Cuvierian Malacopterygii, but is less comprehensive.

malacopterous (mal-ą-kop′tę-rus), a. [< NL. malacopterus, < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + πτερόν, wing (fin).] Having soft fins.

malacopterygian (mal-ą-kop-tę-rij′i-ąn), a. and n. I. a. Soft-finned; pertaining to the Malacopterygii, or having their characters. Also malacopterygious.

II. n. A fish of the order Malacopterygii.

Malacopterygii (mal-ą-kop-tę-rij′i-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + πτέρυξ (πτερυγ-), πτερύγιον, a wing, fin, < πτερόν, a wing.] A group of teleost fishes, variously limited; the soft-finned or jointed-fin fishes. (a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the second division of bony fishes, having soft fin-rays: divided into Abdominales, Subbrachiati, and Apodes. (b) In Müller's system, a group of pharyngognathous fishes, having soft fins, and represented by the family Scomberesocidæ. (c) In Gill's system, an order of teleost fishes with cranial bones of the teleocephalous type, with the anterior vertebræ not specially differentiated from the rest and not coalesced, no Weberian ossicles, the shoulder-girdle connected with the cranium, a mesocoracoid as well as a hypocoracoid and hypercoracoid bones developed, the air-bladder connected with the intestinal canal by a pneumatic duct, the ventral fins abdominal, and the dorsal, anal, and ventral fins spineless. The order includes the clupeids, salmonids, and related fishes. (d) In the earliest systems, as Artedi's, some acanthopterygian fishes with slender or flexible spines were loosely included, as stromateids, the wolf-fishes, the lophobranchiates, etc.—Malacopterygii abdominales, abdominal soft-finned fishes, Cuvier's second order of fishes, having the ventral fins abdominal in position, behind the pectorals and unattached to the shoulder-girdle. Also called Gasteropterygii.—Malacopterygii apodes, apodal soft-finned fishes, Cuvier's fourth order of fishes, having no ventrals.—Malacopterygii subbrachiati, Cuvier's third order of fishes, having the ventrals under the pectorals, and the pelvic arch suspended to the shoulder-girdle.

Fin of Malacopterygian.

malacopterygious (mal-ą-kop-tę-rij′i-us), a. Same as malacopterygian.

Malacoscolices (mal″ą-kō-skol′i-sēz), n. pl. [NL., for malacoscolèces*, < Gr. μαλακός, soft (with ref. to mollusks), + σκώληξ, a worm.] A superordinal division proposed by Huxley in 1877 to be established for the reception of the Polyzoa and Brachiopoda together, in order to indicate the relations of the group so constituted with the worms on the one side and with the mollusks on the other.

malacoscolicine (mal″ą-kō-skol′i-sin), a. Pertaining to the Malacoscolices, or having their characters.

malacosis (mal-ą-kō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + -osis.] In pathol., the morbid softening of tissues.

Malacosteidæ (mal″ą-kos-tē′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Malacosteus + -idæ.] A family of teleost fishes, typified by the genus Malacosteus.

malacosteoid (mal-ą-kos′tē-oid), a. [< Malacosteus + -oid.] Resembling the genus Malacosteus; of or pertaining to the Malacosteidæ.

malacosteon (mal-ą-kos′tē-on), n. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + ὀστέον, bone.] In pathol., osteomalacia.

Malacosteus (mal-ą-kos′tē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + ὀστέον, bone.] A genus of fishes of peculiar aspect, distinguished, among other characters, by the slight calcification of the skeleton, typical of the Malacosteidæ. There are several species, all deep-sea fishes, of which M. niger is the best-known.

malacostomous (mal-ą-kos′tō-mus), a. [< Gr. μαλακός, soft, + στόμα, mouth.] Leather-mouthed; having a soft mouth—that is, toothless jaws: said of fishes.

Malacostraca (mal-ą-kos′trą-kä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μαλακόστρακος, soft-shelled (neut. pl. μαλακόστρακα, Aristotle's name for Crustacea such as crabs, lobsters, etc.), < μαλακός, soft, + ὄστρακον, a shell: see Ostracea, ostracize, etc.] One of two main divisions of the Crustacea proper; the division which is contrasted with Entomostraca. By Latreille the group was divided into five orders, Decapoda, Stomapoda, Læmodipoda, Amphipoda, and Isopoda. Zoölogically speaking, its limits have fluctuated so far and so often with different writers that no comprehensive yet exclusive definition is practicable, and the general tendency is now to ignore the term, along with Entomostraca. Huxley, however, retains both.

malacostracan (mal-ą-kos′trą-kąn), a. and n. [< Malacostraca + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Malacostraca. Also malacostracous.

II. n. A malacostracous crustacean.

malacostracological (mal-ą-kos″trą-kō-loj′i-kąl), a. [< malacostracolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to malacostracology.

malacostracologist (mal-ą-kos-trą-kol′ō-jist), n. [< malacostracolog-y + -ist.] A carcinologist or crustaceologist.

malacostracology (mal-ą-kos-trą-kol′ō-ji), n. [< NL. Malacostraca, q. v., + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of crustaceans; crustaceology; carcinology.

malacostracous (mal-ą-kos′trą-kus), a. [< Gr. μαλακόστρακος, soft-shelled: see Malacostraca.] Same as malacostracan: as, "a malacostracous crustacean," Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 323.

malacotomic (mal″ą-kō-tom′ik), a. [< malacotom-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to malacotomy.

malacotomy (mal-ą-kot′ō-mi), n. [< Gr. μαλακός, soft, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The anatomy of Mollusca.

Malacozoa (mal″ą-kō-zō′ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + ζῷον, an animal.] Soft-bodied animals; the Mollusca in a broad sense, including mollusks proper, brachiopods, and polyzoans.

malacozoic (mal″ą-kō-zō′ik), a. [< Malacozoa + -ic.] Possessing the common features of molluscan life.—Malacozoic series, a phrase proposed by Huxley in 1877 to include a gradation or series of forms represented by the Malacoscolices of the same author and the Mollusca; it includes animals graded from the lowest Polyzoa to the highest mollusks.

maladaptation (mal″ad-ap-tā′shon), n. [< mal- + adaptation.] Faulty adaptation; lack of adaptation. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 273.

maladdress (mal-ą-dres′), n. [< mal- + address.] Lack of address; want of tact; awkwardness; rudeness.

It took all the mal-address of which travellers are masters to secure admittance.
Howells, Their Wedding Journey, p. 241.

maladjustment (mal-ą-just′ment), n. [< mal- + adjustment.] A faulty adjustment; lack of adjustment.

maladministration (mal-ad-min-is-trā′shon), n. [< F. maladministration; as mal- + administration.] Faulty management of affairs; vicious or defective conduct in the performance of official duties, particularly of executive and ministerial duties prescribed by law. Formerly maleadministration.

The violence of revolutions is generally proportioned to the degree of the maladministration which has produced them. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiii.

maladroit (mal-ą-droit′), a. [< F. maladroit; as mal- + adroit.] Not adroit or dexterous; inexpert; clumsy; awkward; unhandy; bungling.

maladroitly (mal-ą-droit′li), adv. In a maladroit manner; clumsily; awkwardly.

maladroitness (mal-ą-droit′nes), n. The character of being maladroit; clumsiness; awkwardness; want of skill or tact.

malady (mal′ą-di), n.; pl. maladies (-diz). [< ME. maladye, < OF. (and F.) maladie, sickness, illness, disease, < malade, malabde, F. malade = Pr. malapte, malaude, sick, < LL. male habitus*, sick, lit. 'ill conditioned' (cf. LL. male habens, sick, L. male se habere, be sick or indisposed, be in ill condition): L. male, badly (< malus, bad: see mal-, male[3]); habitus, pp. of habere, have, hold: see habit.] 1. A physical disorder or disease; sickness or distemper of any kind; especially, a chronic, deep-seated, or dangerous disease.

Merlin seide "He shall not dye on this maladye."
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 51.

Why was it that, in that epidemic malady of constitutions, ours escaped the destroying influence?
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

The Comanches think a malady is caused by the blasting breath of a foe. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 125.

2. Hence, moral or mental disorder; any disordered state or condition: as, social maladies. =Syn. 1. Infirmity, Distemper, etc. (see disease); complaint, ailment.

mala fide (mā′lą fī′dē). [L., abl. of mala fides, bad faith: see mala fides.] With bad faith; deceitfully; treacherously: opposed to bona fide. In Scots law, a mala fide possessor is a person who possesses a subject not his own upon a title which he knows to be bad, or which he has reasonable ground for believing to be so.

mala fides (mā′lą fī′dēz). [L.: mala, fem. of malus, bad; fides, > ult. E. faith; cf. bona fides.] Bad faith.

malafiges, n. [< D. malefijtje: origin obscure.] A sailors' name for a small sea-bird supposed to appear before a storm: apparently, the stormy petrel or Mother Carey's chicken.

Malaga (mal′ą-gą), n. [See def.] A wine produced at Malaga in Spain. The wines specifically so named are made from the last vintage, which occurs in October and November. There are several varieties. Thudicum and Dupré.—Malaga grape, any of the grapes grown near Malaga, especially those exported thence. The muscadel is a leading variety. In America the name Malaga is given to any variety of large oval white grape.

Malagash (mal-ą-gash′), n. Same as Malagasy.

Malagasy (mal-ą-gas′i), a. and n. [Formerly ★Madegassy, Madecassee; = F. Malgache; an adj. formed from the native name of Madagascar.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Madagascar or its inhabitants.

It was not until the publication of the official chart by D'Après de Mannevillette, from actual hydrographic survey, in 1776, that any notable progress was effected in the delineation of the Malagasy seaboard.
Athenæum, No. 3071, p. 332.

II. n. A native of Madagascar; a member of any of the races or tribes inhabiting that island.

malagma† (ma-lag′mą), n. [= F. It. malagma, < L. malagma, < Gr. μάλαγμα, a plaster, a poultice, < μαλάσσειν, soften: see malax.] In therap., an external local medicament designed to soften the part to which it is applied; an emollient cataplasm; a poultice.

malaguetta pepper. Same as grains of paradise (which see, under grain[1]).

malahack (mal-ą-hak′), v. t. [Origin obscure.] See the quotation.

Malahack: to cut up hastily or awkwardly.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., Int.

Malaic (mą-lā′ik), a. [< Malay + -ic.] Same as Malay.

malaise (ma-lāz′), n. [< F. malaise, uneasiness, discomfort: see malease.] Uneasiness; discomfort; specifically, an indefinite feeling of uneasiness, often a preliminary symptom of a serious malady.

Malaisian, a. See Malaysian.

Malambo bark. See bark[2].

malanders, mallanders (mal′an-dėrz), n. pl. [Also mallenders, mallinders; < F. malandre = It. malandra, malanders, also a dead rotten knot, < L. malandria (neut. pl., LL. also fem. sing.), blisters or pustules on the neck, esp. of horses.] In farriery, a dry scab or scurfy eruption on the hock of a horse or at the bend of the knee; "sore places on the inside of the fore legs of a horse" (Halliwell).

She has the mallanders, the scratches, the crown scab, and the quitter bone in the t'other leg.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, ii. 1.

malapert (mal′ą-pėrt), a. and n. [< ME. malapert, maleperte, < OF. malapert, < mal, badly (here negative, as in maladroit), + appert for espert, clever, able, expert: see expert.] I. a. Saucy; impudent; bold; forward.

She was wis and loved hym nevere the lasse,
Al nere he malapert. Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 87.

Untutor'd lad, thou art too malapert.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 5. 32.

He is bitterly censured by Marinus Marcennus, a malapert friar. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 454.

II. n. A pert, saucy person.

malapertly (mal′ą-pėrt-li), adv. In a malapert manner; saucily; with impudence.

malapertness (mal′ą-pėrt-nes), n. The character of being malapert; sauciness; impudent pertness or forwardness.

malappropriate (mal-ą-prō′pri-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. malappropriated, ppr. malappropriating. [< mal- + appropriate.] To misappropriate; apply to a wrong use; misuse.

She thrust the hearth-brush into the grates in mistake for the poker, and malappropriated several other articles of her craft. E. Brontë, Wuthering Heights, xxxii.

malaprop (mal′a-prop), a. [In allusion to Mrs. Malaprop, a character in Sheridan's play of "The Rivals," noted for her blunders in the use of words (< malapropos, q. v.).] Malapropos. [Rare.]

But observe . . . the total absence of all malaprop picturesqueness. De Quincey, Style, i.

malapropism (mal′a-prop-izm), n. [< malaprop + -ism.] 1. The act or habit of misapplying words through an ambition to use fine language.—2. A word so misapplied.

The Fieldhead estate and the De Walden estate were delightfully contagious—a malapropism which rumour had not failed to repeat to Shirley. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xvii.

malapropos (mal-ap-rō-pō′), a. and adv. [< mal- + apropos: see apropos.] I. a. Inappropriate; out of place; inapt; unseasonable: as, a malapropos remark.

II. adv. Unsuitably; unseasonably.

Malapteruridæ (ma-lap-te-rō′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Malapterurus + -idæ.] A family of nematognathous fishes. They are electric fishes in which "the electric organ extends over the whole body, but is thickest on the abdomen. It lies between two aponeurotic membranes below the skin, and consists of rhomboidal cells which contain a rather firm gelatinous substance. The electric nerve takes its origin from the spinal cord." The shock given is great for the size of the fish. Three species are known, the most familiar of which is Torpedo (Malapterurus) electricus of the Nile, which sometimes attains a length of four feet. Also Torpedinidæ.

Malapterurina (ma-lap″te-rō-rī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Malapterurus + -ina[2].] In Günther's classification, a group of Siluridæ stenobranchiæ with no rayed dorsal fin: same as the family Malapteruridæ.

malapterurine (ma-lap-te-rō′rin), a. Of or pertaining to the Malapterurina; malapteruroid.

malapteruroid (ma-lap-te-rō′roid), a. and n. [< Malapterurus + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to the Malapteruridæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A fish of the family Malapteruridæ.

Malapterurus (ma-lap-te-rō′rus), n. [NL. (Lacépède, 1803), short for Malacopterurus*, < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + πτερόν, wing (fin), + οὐρά, tail.] A genus of nematognathous catfishes, representing the family Malapteruridæ (Torpedinidæ), with an adipose fin over the caudal region and no true dorsal fin; the electric fishes. T. electricus inhabits the Nile.

★malar (mā′lär), a. and n. [< NL. malaris, < L. mala, the upper jaw, the cheek-bone, the cheek, < mandere, chew: see mandible.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the cheek or cheek-bone.—2. Of or pertaining to the zygoma; zygomatic; jugal: as, the malar arch.—Malar bone. See II.—Malar foramina. See foramen.—Malar point. See craniometry.

II. n. A membrane bone or splint-bone of the side of the head of higher vertebrates, entering into the composition of the zygoma or zygomatic arch, which connects the upper jaw or other part of the face with the squamosal or other parts about the ear; the jugal or jugal bone. In most animals it is a long and slender horizontal bone, in man a short and stout quadrangular bone, the cheek-bone, forming the prominence of the cheek, entering into the composition of the orbit of the eye, and articulating not only with the temporal and superior maxillary, but also with the frontal and sphenoid.

malardet, n. An obsolete form of mallard.

malaria (mā-lā′ri-ä), n. [= F. malaria, < It. ★mal' aria, bad air: mala, fem. of malo, < L. malus, bad (see mal-, male[3]); aria, < L. aër, air: see air[1].] 1. Air contaminated with some pathogenic substance; miasma; formerly, in a specific sense, air supposed to be impregnated with the poison producing intermittent and remittent fever.—2. A generic term designating intermittent and remittent fever and other affections, such as neuralgia, due to the same cause. Malarial diseases in this sense prevail in nearly all quarters of the globe, being coextensive with the distribution of mosquitos of the genus Anopheles. There are three recognized forms of malaria, called tertian, quartan, and estivo-autumnal, or summer-autumn, fevers, the latter including the pernicious and tropical forms. The disease is caused by the presence in the red blood-corpuscles of a protozoan body, the Plasmodium malariæ, each of the three forms having its special variety of parasite. This parasite has two cycles of existence—one, the non-sexual, in man, the other, the sexual, in the mosquito. The female anopheles draws the parasite into the intestinal tract when she sucks the blood of a malarial subject. Sexual generation occurs in the body of the mosquito and the young parasites, collected in the salivary gland of the insect, are injected into the blood of the next person bitten by the mosquito. Here they undergo development and non-sexual reproduction, causing the paroxysms of malaria. Besides the well-marked fevers, the malarial poison produces various and often ill-marked perversions of the general health, such as neuralgia, neuritis, anemia, digestive disturbances, and albuminuria. The anatomical effects of the malarial poison are enlargement of the spleen, sometimes excessive, darkening of the skin, and the presence of a dark pigment in the blood, in amorphous masses. All the forms of malaria are, as a rule, affected favorably by quinine, and to a less degree by certain other drugs, notably arsenic.

★malarial (mā-lā′ri-al), a. [< malaria + -al.] Relating or pertaining to malaria; connected with or arising from malaria: as, malarial cachexia, disease, or fever; the malarial poison.

Neuralgic affections . . . are common sequels of malarial poisoning. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 916.

Malarial fever. See fever[1].

malarialist (mā-lā′ri-al-ist), n. [< malarial + -ist.] A student of malaria; one who studies the treatment of malarial disease.

According as one is a sanitarian, a chemist, or a malarialist. Harper's Mag., LXIX. 441.

malarian (mā-lā′ri-an), a. [< malaria + -an.] Malarial; malarious. [Rare.]

A flat malarian world of reed and rush! Tennyson, Lover's Tale, iv.

malarimaxillary (mā″lar-i-mak′si-lā-ri), a. [< NL. malaris, malar, + maxillaris, maxillary.] Of or pertaining to the malar and the supramaxillary bone: as, the malarimaxillary suture. Also malomaxillary.

malarious (mā-lā′ri-us), a. [< malaria + -ous.] Characterized by or abounding with malaria; producing or communicating malarial disease: as, a malarious region or climate; a malarious state of the atmosphere.

A fever alley or a malarious ditch. C. Kingsley, Life (1878), II. 370.

malassimilation (mal-a-sim-i-lā′shon), n. [< mal- + assimilation.] In pathol., imperfect assimilation or nutrition; faulty digestion and appropriation of nutriment.

malate (mā′lāt), n. [< mal(ic) + -ate[1].] In chem., any salt of malic acid.

malaxt (mā′laks), v. t. [= F. malaxer = Pg. malaxar, < L. malaxare, < Gr. μαλάσσειν, soften, < μαλακός, soft.] Same as malaxate.

I directed one of my servants to apply an emplast. diachyl. cum gummi, malaxed with unguent dialthææ. Wiseman, Surgery, i. 9.

malaxage (mal′ak-sāj), n. [< malax + -age.] The operation of kneading and working the unbaked clay of which pottery is to be made.

malaxate (mal′ak-sāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. malaxated, ppr. malaxating. [< L. malaxatus, pp. of malaxare, soften: see malax.] To soften; ★knead to softness.

★malaxation (mal-ak-sā′shon), n. [= F. malaxation, < LL. malaxatio(n-), a softening, < L. malaxare, soften: see malax, malaxate.] The act of malaxating or moistening and softening; the act of forming ingredients into a mass for pills or plasters. [Rare.]

malaxator (mal′ak-sā-tor), n. [< NL. malaxator, < L. malaxare, soften: see malax, malaxate.] A name of many machines used for mixing various materials. Most of these machines—for example, mills for grinding and tempering clay in brick-making, for mixing mortar, etc.—have a rotating vertical shaft with radial blade-like arms working in a cylindrical inclosure. They are often moved by horses, mules, or oxen attached to the end of a lever projecting horizontally from the upper part of the shaft. In many cases, however, other power is used.

Malaxeæ (mā-lak′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1845), < Malaxis + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants of the family Orchidaceæ, the orchid family, belonging to the tribe Epidendreæ. It embraced 2 genera, Malaxis and Hammarbya, but the name Malaxis was erroneously applied to the latter. Engler refers these genera to the tribe Liparideæ.

Malaxis (mā-lak′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μάλαξις, a softening, < μαλάσσειν, soften: see malax.] 1. An untenable name for Hammarbya, a genus of orchidaceous plants of the tribe Epidendreæ. There is but a single species, the bog-orchis, H. paludosa, which is found growing in spongy bogs in northern Europe.

2. A genus of orchidaceous plants, the species of which have been incorrectly referred to Microstylis. Swartz, 1788.

Malay (mā-lā′), n. and a. [= F. Malai, Malais = Sp. Pg. Malayo (cf. D. Maleisch); < Malay Mālāyu, Malay (Orang Mālāyu, Malay men; Tānah Mālāyu, Malay land).] I. n. 1. A native of Malacca or of the Malay peninsula, or of the adjacent islands.

The Malays—the name is said to mean the same thing as that of the Parthians, viz. . . . emigrants. J. Hadley, Essays (1873), p. 29.

2. The language of the Malays. It is a dialect belonging to the Malayan branch of the Malay-Polynesian family.—3. A variety of the domestic hen, having a tall and slender shape like that of the exhibition game, but larger, and long legs and neck and a close, low tail. The shanks are yellow; the comb is flat or strawberry-shaped. In coloration the hen is chocolate- or cinnamon-brown, with green-black lacing, while the cock resembles a dull-colored black-breasted red game-cock. The eggs are large and brown.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Malays or to their country. Also Malaic.—Malay apple, a small tree, Caryophyllus Malaccensis, or its fruit. It is found wild in the Malayan, Polynesian, and Sandwich islands, and widely cultivated, in many varieties. The fruit is of good size, with the form of a quince, juicy, delicate-flavored, and of an apple-like scent.—Malay porcupine, a brush-tailed porcupine, Atherura fasciculata.—Malay race, one of the five principal divisions of mankind according to Blumenbach. In this division the head is slightly narrowed; the forehead fairly well rounded; the nose somewhat wide, with a thick point; the mouth large; the upper jaw slightly projecting; the hair black, soft, thick, and curled.—Malay tapir, the Indian or Asiatic tapir, Tapirus indicus or malayanus. See tapir.

Malayalam (mal-ä-yä′lam), n. [Malayalam Malayālam.] The language of Malabar, in southwestern India: it is a Dravidian dialect.

II. n. Same as Malay.

Malayopolynesian (mā-lā′ō-pol-i-nē′shian), a. Same as Malay-Polynesian.

Malay-Polynesian (mā-lā′pol-i-nē′shian), a. Including the Malay and Polynesian: applied to a family of languages occupying most of the islands of the Pacific, from Madagascar to Easter Island (not, however, Australia and Tasmania, New Guinea, and some of the adjacent islands, nor the central parts of Borneo), together with the Malayan peninsula. Its principal branches are the Malayan, of the peninsula and the islands nearest it, and the Polynesian, of the great mass of scattered islands (including Madagascar and New Zealand); to these is added by many the Melanesian, of the Fiji archipelago and its vicinity, which others regard as a separate family. The languages are of extreme simplicity, in regard both to phonetic and to grammatical structure.

Malaysian (mā-lā′si-an), a. [< Malay (F. Malais) + -ian.] Relating to the Malay peninsula or archipelago, or to the Malays. Also spelled Malaisian. Encyc. Brit., XV. 324.

I. a. Dissatisfied; discontented; especially, dissatisfied or discontented with the existing order of things, as with the constitution of society, or the administration of government.

I speak not much: yet in my little Talk Much vanity and many Lies do walk;
I wish too-earnest, and too-oft (in fine)
For others Fortunes, male-content with mine.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Lawe.

Nicholas Durantius, a Knight of Malta, sirnamed Villagagnon, in the yeere 1555 (malecontent with his estate at home) sayled into Francia Antarctica.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 837.

II. n. A discontented person; specifically, a discontented subject of government; one who murmurs at the laws and administration, or who manifests his dissatisfaction by overt acts, as in sedition or insurrection.

He that wrote the Satyr of Piers Ploughman seemed to haue bene a malcontent of that time, and therefore bent himselfe wholy to taxe the disorders of that age.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 50.

In Connecticut and New Hampshire the body of the people rose in support of government, and obliged the malcontents to go to their homes.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 70.

malcontented (mal-kon-ten'ted), a. [Formerly also malecontented; as malcontent + -ed[2].] Discontented; dissatisfied: as, "the malecontented multitude," Bp. Hall.

See conceptacle, 2.—Male die, the upper one of a pair of dies.—Male flower, gage, knot-grass. See the nouns.—Male incense, frankincense or olibanum in the form of tears or globular drops, regarded as the best kind.

May virgins, when they come to mourn,
Male incense burn.
Herrick, Dirge of Jephthah's Daughter.

Male order, in arch., the Doric order: so styled because, according to the fancy of Vitruvius, its sturdy proportions were modeled after those of the male human form, the proportions of the more slender and rounded Ionic order after those of the female form.—Male rimes, rimes in which only the final syllables correspond, as disdain and complain.—Male screw, a screw of which the threads, carried about the exterior surface of a cylinder, correspond to and enter spiral grooves formed in the surface of a cylindrical hole and constituting a female screw.—Male system, in bot., the part of a plant which belongs to and includes the fecundating organs.=Syn. Manly, etc. See masculine.

II. n. 1. One of the sex of human kind that begets young; a man or boy; by extension, and usually, one of the sex of any animal that begets young: opposed to female. In zoölogy the sign universally used for a male is ♂ (Mars), the sign ♀ (Venus) signifying female.

Your lamb shall be without blemish, a male of the first year. Ex. xii. 5.

Bring forth men-children only!
For thy undaunted mettle should compose
Nothing but males. Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 74.

2. In plants characterized by sexual differences and reproduced by sexual generation, that individual of which the special function is to form the substance essential to the fertility of the germ developed by the female.—Complemental or supplemental male, in zoöl. See complemental, 2, and quotation under Scalpellum.—Dwarf male. See dwarf.

male[2]†, n. An obsolete form of mail[2].

So doth that blast the spirits maledict.
Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, v. 42.

★malediction (mal-ē-dik'shon), n. [< ME. maledíccion, < OF. maledíction, also (maleïçon, maleïsson, > E. malison) F. malédiction = Pr. maledictio, maledicio = Sp. maldición = Pg. maldição = It. maladizione, maledizione, < L. maledictio(n-), evil speaking, abuse, LL. the act of cursing, < maledicere, speak evil of: see maledict, v. Cf. malison.] Evil speaking; a cursing; the utterance of a curse or execration; also, a curse.

Now ye shall [haue] maledíccion.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 5635.

My name perhaps among the circumcised . . .
With maledíction mention'd. Milton, S. A., l. 978.

=Syn. Malediction, Curse, Imprecation, Execration, Anathema. All these are strong words; they are all presumably of the nature of prayers, malediction having the least of this meaning. Malediction in its derivation contains the idea that is common to them all, that of expressing a desire for evil upon another. Curse, imprecation, and execration are often used of the wanton calling down of evil upon those with whom one is angry, but all five may indicate a formal or official act. Execration expresses most of personal hatred; indeed, the word is sometimes used simply to express an intense and outspoken hatred: as, he was held in execration. Anathema has kept within its original limits, as expressing a curse pronounced formally by ecclesiastical authority.

maledictory (mal-ē-dik'tō-ri), a. Pertaining to, containing, or consisting in malediction or cursing; imprecatory.

She poured out . . . a flood of maledictory prophecy against the doers of the deed; . . . she cursed with outstretched arms.
Geo. MacDonald, What's Mine's Mine, p. 318.

Malesherbia (mal-e-shėr'bi-ą), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), named after Lamoignon de Malesherbes, a French patriot and agriculturist.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, constituting the family Malesherbiaceæ and related to the Passifloraceæ, or passion-flower family, characterized by having a tubular calyx, petals shorter than the calyx-lobes, and flowers in a bracted raceme. They are erect woolly undershrubs, with narrow leaves and rather large yellow flowers, arranged in a long leafy raceme or thyrse. There are about twenty-five species, natives of Argentina, Chile, and Peru, a few of which are sometimes cultivated for ornament. They are often called crown-worts.

Malesherbiaceæ (mal-e-shėr-bi-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Don, 1827), < Malesherbia + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants related to the Turneraceæ and Passifloraceæ, formerly included in the latter. It consists of the single genus Malesherbia (which see). The character which chiefly distinguishes this family from the Passifloraceæ is the absence of the conspicuous fringe in the throat of the calyx, which is here reduced to a more or less distinctly toothed border.

Malesherbieæ (mal″e-shėr-bī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), < Malesherbia + -eæ.] Same as Malesherbiaceæ, regarded by de Candolle as a tribe of the Passifloraceæ.

Her maukin knuckles were never shapen to that royall buskin. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

malkinly†, mawkinly†, a. [< malkin, mawkin, + -ly[1].] Like a malkin; slatternly.

Some silly souls are prone to place much piety in their mawkingly [read mawkinly] plainness, and in their censoriousness of others who use more comely and costly curiosities. Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 87.

mall[1] (mâl), n. [Also maul (the verb being commonly spelled maul); < ME. malle, < OF. mal, maul, mail, F. mail = Pr. malh, maill, mal = Pg. malho = It. maglio, malleo, a mall, < L. malleus, a hammer, mall, mallet. Cf. the var. mell[3], mail[4] (< F.), and dim. mallet.] 1. A heavy hammer or club of any sort; especially, a heavy wooden hammer used by carpenters. Compare mallet and beetle[1], 1. [In this sense now commonly maul.]

Whan Arthur saugh the Geaunte lifte vp his malle he douted the stroke. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 339.

Eftsoones one of those villeins him did rap
Upon his headpeece with his yron mall,
That he was soone awaked therewithall.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. v. 42.

2. (a) A war-hammer or martel-de-fer.

A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a maul, and a sword, and a sharp arrow. Prov. xxv. 18.

(b) The head or striking part of a war-hammer or martel-de-fer. (c) The blunt or square projection of such a hammer, as distinguished from the beak on the opposite side of the handle: this blunt end was often divided into four, six, or more blunt points or protuberances.—3. An old game played with a wooden ball in a kind of smooth alley boarded in at each side, in which the ball was struck with a mallet in order to send it through an iron arch called the pass, placed at the end of the alley. Strutt. —4†. The mallet with which this game was played; also, the alley in which it was played.—5†. [< mall[1], v.] A blow.

And give that reverend head a mall,
Or two, or three, against a wall.
S. Butler, Hudibras.

Top-mall, a heavy iron hammer used on board ship.

mall[1]† (mâl), v. t. [Also and more commonly maul; < ME. mallen, < OF. mailler = Pg. malhar = It. magliare, < ML. malleare, beat with a mall, < malleus, a mall, hammer: see mall[1], n.] To beat, especially with a mall or mallet; bruise.

I salle evene amange his mene malle hym to dede.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 4038.

Lys. Would not my ghost start up, and fly upon thee?
Cy. No, I'd mall it down again with this.
[She snatches up the crow.]
Chapman, Widow's Tears, v. 4.

mall[2] (mel or mal), n. [< mall[1], n., through pall-mall, the game so called, and a place, Pall-Mall, where it was played: see pall-mall.] A public walk; a level shaded walk.

The mall without comparison is the noblest in Europe for length and shade, having 7 rowes of the tallest and goodliest elms I had ever beheld.
Evelyn, Diary, May 2, 1644.

This the beau-monde shall from the Mall survey.
Pope, R. of the L., v. 133.

mall[3] (mal), n. [< ML. mallum, mallus, a court: see mallum, mallus.] A court: same as mallum, mallus.

Councils, which had been as frequent as diets or malls, ceased. Milman.

malanders, n. pl. See malanders.

mallard (mal′ärd), n. [< ME. malarde, maulard, mawlerd, also irreg. mawdelare, mawarde, < OF. malard, malart, a wild duck, prob., with suffix -ard, < male, male: see male[1]. The F. dial. form maillard appar. simulates F. maille, a spot: see mail[1].] 1. The wild drake; the male of the common wild duck.

And with a bolt afterward,
Anon he hitt a maulard.
Arthour and Merlin, p. 154. (Halliwell.)

Hence—2. The common wild duck, Anas boscas, the feral stock whence the domestic duck in all its varieties has descended, and the typical representative of the family Anatidæ and subfamily Anatinæ. See duck[2]. The mallard is from 22 to 24 inches long, by 32 to 36 in extent of wings. The male has the head and neck glossy-green, succeeded by a white ring; the breast purplish-chestnut; the lower back, rump, and tail-coverts glossy-black; the tail-feathers mostly whitish, with a curly tuft; the wing-speculum iridescent, bordered with black and white; the bill greenish-yellow; the feet orange-red; and the iris brown. The female has the wings and feet as in the male, the bill greenish-black blotched with orange, and the body-colors variegated in fine pattern with lighter and darker brownish shades. The mallard is found in nearly all parts of the world. It nests on the ground, laying usually from 8 to 10 yellowish-drab eggs measuring about 2¼ by 1⅝ inches.

Mallard (Anas boscas).

mallardite (mal′ärd-dīt), n. [Named after E. Mallard, a French mineralogist.] A hydrous sulphate of manganese occurring in fibrous crystalline masses: found in Utah.

malleability (mal′ē-a-bil′i-ti), n. [= F. malléabilité = Sp. maleabilidad = Pg. malleabilidade = It. malleabilità; as malleable + -ity.] The property of being malleable; capability of being shaped or permanently extended by pressure, as by hammering or rolling, without losing coherence or continuity; the property of being susceptible of extension by beating or rolling.

The malleability of brass varies with its composition and with its temperature. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 321.

malleable (mal′ē-a-bl), a. [Early mod. E. malliable, < F. malléable = Sp. maleable = Pg. malleavel = It. malleabile, < ML. malleare, beat with a hammer: see malleate.] Capable of being shaped or extended by beating or rolling; capable of extension by hammering; reducible to a laminated form by beating, as gold, which may be beaten into leaves (gold-foil) of extreme thinness; hence, capable of being shaped by outside influence; yielding. See foil[1].

This Blow at Sea was so much greater than that at Land that, where that made him only doubt, this made him despair, at least made him malleable, and fit to be wrought upon by Composition. Baker, Chronicles, p. 78.

Mark the effect produced on our councils by continued insolence and invetorate hostility: we grow more malleable under their blows. Burke, A Regicide Peace, iii.

Malleable bronze. See bronze.—Malleable iron castings. See iron.

malleableness (mal′ē-a-bl-nes), n. Malleability.

malleate (mal′ē-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. malleated, ppr. malleating. [< ML. (L. in derivatives) malleatus, pp. of malleare, beat with a hammer, mall, < L. malleus, a hammer: see mall[1], n. Cf. mall[1], v.] To hammer; form into a plate or leaf by beating.

malleation (mal-ē-ā′shọn), n. [< malleate + -ion.] 1. The act of beating into a plate or leaf, as a metal; extension by beating.

His squire, by often malleations, hammerings, poundings, and threshings, might in good time be beaten out into the form of a gentleman.
Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote (1654), p. 67. (Latham.)

2†. Malleability; capability of being shaped by hammering.

Sub. What's the proper passion of metals?
Face. Malleation. B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

3. In pathol., a convulsive action of one or both hands, which strike the thigh like a hammer.

mallecho† (mal′ē-chō), n. [Also malicho; perh. < Sp. malhecho = OF. malfait, < ML. malefactum*, malefacta, an evil deed, < male, evil, + factus, done, factum (> Sp. hecho = F. fait), deed, act: see mal- and fact, feat.] Found only in the following passage, and of uncertain meaning; possibly, evil-doing.

Oph. What means this, my lord?
Ham. Marry, this is miching mallecho [var. malicho, mallico]; it means mischief. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 146.

malledius (ma-lē′di-us), n.; pl. malledii (-i). [NL., < L. malleus, a hammer, + NL. (stap)edius.] A muscle of the tympanum attached to the malleus; the tensor tympani: correlated with stapedius and incudius. Coues and Shute, 1887.

mallee (mal′ē), n. [Australian.] Two dwarf species of Eucalyptus, E. dumosa and E. oleosa, growing in Australia. They sometimes form immense tracts of brushwood, called mallee-scrub.

If you will get any bushman to tell you that land covered with Eucalyptus dumosus, vulgarly called Mallee, and exceedingly stunted specimens of that, will grow anything, I will tell him he knows nothing.
H. Kingsley, Hillyars and Burtons, liv.

mallee-bird (mal′ē-bėrd), n. The Leipoa ocellata, a bird of the family Megapodidæ (see Leipoa). Also called native pheasant by the English in Australia. A. Newton.

mallei, n. Plural of malleus.

Malleidæ (ma-lē′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Malleus + -idæ.] A family of bivalves, typified by the genus Malleus; the hammer-oysters: same as Aviculidæ or Pteriidæ.

malleifer (ma-lē′i-fėr), n. [< NL. malleifer: see malleiferous.] A vertebrate of the superclass Malleifera.

Malleifera (mal-ē-if′e-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of malleifer: see malleiferous.] A superclass of craniate Vertebrata, or skulled vertebrates, distinguished by the development of the malleus as a bone of the ear, and by the direct articulation of the lower jaw to the skull. It corresponds to the class Mammalia, and contrasts with Quadratifera and Lyrifera.

malleiferous (mal-ē-if′e-rus), a. [< NL. malleifer, < L. malleus, a hammer, a mall, + ferre, = E. bear[1].] Having a distinct malleus; of or pertaining to the Malleifera; mammalian.

malleiform (mal′ē-i-fôrm), a. [< L. malleus, a hammer, a mall, + forma, form.] In zoöl., hammer-shaped.

In some species of Polynoë the parapodia give rise, at corresponding points, to large, richly ciliated, malleiform tubercles. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 210.

mallemaroking (mal′ē-ma-rō″king), n. [Verbal n. of mallemaroke*, said to be < D. mallemerok, a foolish woman, a tomboy, < mal, foolish, + merok*, marok*, marot, < F. marotte, a fool's bauble, orig. a little girl, lit. 'little Mary,' dim. of Marie, Mary.] Naut., the visiting and carousing of seamen in the Greenland ships. Sailor's Word-book.

mallemuck (mal′ē-muk), n. [Also mallemock, mallemoke, mollymock, mollymawk, malmock, malduck, malmarsh, etc.; = G. mallemucke, < D. mallemok (also mallemugge, as if connected with mugge, mug, a gnat), < mal, foolish, + mok, a gull. Compare the equiv. D. mallemeeuw ('foolish mew').] The fulmar petrel, Fulmarus glacialis: also extended to some related birds, as albatrosses. See cut under fulmar[2]. Also called malmarsh.

mallenders (mal′en-dėrz), n. pl. Same as malanders.

malleo-incudal (mal″ē-ō-in-kū′dal), a. [< L. malleus (see malleus) + incud(em) (see incus) + -al.] Pertaining both to the malleus and to the incus. N. E. D.

malleolar (mal′ē-ō-lär), a. [< malleolus + -ar[3].] 1. Having the character of a malleolus: as, the malleolar process of the tibia.—2. Of or pertaining to either malleolus: as, a malleolar artery.

malleolus (ma-lē′ō-lus), n.; pl. malleoli (-lī). [NL., < L. malleolus, a small hammer, dim. of malleus, a hammer: see malleus.] 1. In anat., a bony protuberance on either side of the ankle. The two together contribute to the stability of the ankle-joint, by locking the astragalus so as to prevent lateral and rotatory movements. In man the outer malleolus is formed by the fibula, the inner by the tibia; and each forms a sort of pulley or trochlea around which wind the tendons of important extensor muscles of the foot. The malleoli are little distinguished in most animals, owing to the different set of the foot upon the leg, or the different configuration of the parts. When, as often occurs, the fibula does not reach the ankle, the outer malleolus is wanting unless formed by the tibia. In birds the condyles of the tibia, constituted by ankylosis of proximal tarsal bones, take the name and place of malleoli.

2. In bot., a layer; a shoot bent into the ground and half divided at the bend, whence it emits roots. Lindley.—3. [cap.] In conch., a genus of bivalve shells. J. E. Gray, 1847.—Inner malleolus, the malleolar process of the tibia, articulating with the inner side of the astragalus, having behind it the tendons of the tibialis posticus and flexor longus digitorum.—Outer malleolus, the enlarged lower end of the fibula, articulating with the outer side of the astragalus, having behind it the tendons of the peroneus longus and peroneus brevis.

malleoramate (mal″ē-ō-rā′māt), a. [< L. malleus, a hammer, + ramus, a branch: see ramate.] In rotifers, having mallei fastened by uncus to rami, as in the Melicertidæ, Triarthridæ, Pterodinidæ, and Pedalionidæ.

mallet (mal′et), n. [< OF. mallet, maillet, F. maillet (= Pr. malhet = It. maglietto), a wooden hammer, mallet, dim. of mal, mail, a hammer: see mall[1].] 1. A small beetle or wooden hammer used by carpenters, stonecutters, printers, etc., chiefly for driving another tool, as a chisel, or the like. It is wielded with one hand, while the heavier mall requires the use of both hands. —2. The wooden implement used to strike the balls in the game of croquet.—Automatic mallet. Same as dental hammer (which see, under hammer[1]).—Dental mallet. (a) A light hammer of wood or metal used by dentists for striking the plugger in the operation of filling teeth. It is now superseded in great part by various mechanical contrivances, such as the dental hammer or plugger and the electric plugger. (b) A dental hammer or plugger. See hammer[1].

mallet-flower (mal′et-flou″ėr), n. Any plant of the genus Tupistra.

malleus (mal′ē-us), n.; pl. mallei (-ī). [NL., < L. malleus, a hammer, a mall: see mall[1].] 1. In anat., the proximal element of Meckel's cartilage, in any way distinguished from the rest of the mandibular arch. In man and other mammals the malleus is separately ossified, and is the outer one of the three bonelets or ossicles of the ear lodged in the cavity of the tympanum, connected with the ear-drum or tympanic membrane, and movably articulated with the incus. It is named from its hammer-like shape in man, having a head, neck, and handle or short process, together with a processus gracilis, which lies in the Glaserian fissure. As one of the ossicula auditus, the malleus subserves the function of hearing in mammals. In birds, and many other vertebrates below mammals, the malleus has a very different office, that of forming part of the suspensorium of the lower jaw, which is its true morphological character. Its specialization in Mammalia is peculiar to that class. See Malleifera, and cuts under hyoid, ear, and tympanic.

2. In ichth., one of the Weberian ossicles which form a chain between the air-bladder and the auditory apparatus in the skull of plectospondylous and nematognathous fishes. It is homologous with the hemapophysis of the third one of the coalesced anterior vertebræ.—3. In rotifers, one of the paired calcareous structures within the pharynx. In the typical forms it is a hammer-like body, consisting of an upper part or head, called the incus, and a lower part or handle, named the manubrium, but in other forms the distinction disappears.

4. [cap.] In conch., a genus of pearl-oysters of the family Aviculidæ, founded by Lamarck in 1799; the hammer-shells. They have a long-winged hinge at right angles with the length of the valve, giving a hammer-like shape, whence the name. Young shells are like those of Avicula or wing-shells, and have a byssal notch; the hammer shape is gradually acquired with age. M. vulgaris, the hammer-oyster, inhabits Eastern seas. See cut under hammer-shell.

5. Same as war-hammer.

mallinders (mal′in-dėrz), n. pl. Same as malanders.

Mallophaga (ma-lof′a-gä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of mallophagus: see mallophagous.] An order of ametabolous apterous parasitic insects with mandibulate mouth-parts and coalesced mesometathorax, jointed antennæ and palpi, superior spiracles, and short stout legs ending in hooked claws. They are known as bird-lice, and are very numerous and diversiform. Formerly they were regarded as Hemiptera degraded and distorted by parasitism, and placed with the true lice in a group Parasita or Anoplura; later they were held to constitute a superfamily or suborder of Pseudoneuroptera by some, and by others again a suborder of Corrodentia. See louse[1].

mallophagan (ma-lof′a-gan), a. and n. [< NL. Mallophaga + -an.] I. a. Same as mallophagous.

II. n. A louse of the order Mallophaga.

Mallophagidæ (mal-ō-faj′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mallophaga + -idæ.] The mallophagous insects regarded as a family of Pseudoneuroptera, and corresponding to the order Mallophaga. They differ from true lice in having mandibulate instead of suctorial mouth-parts, and in other respects. Most of them live on the plumage of birds, whence the name bird-lice for the whole of them; but some also infest the pelage of mammals. Some are great pests of the poultry-yard and aviary. The genera are numerous, including Nirmus, Trichodectes, and Goniodes.

mallophagous (ma-lof′a-gus), a. [< NL. mallophagus, < Gr. μαλλός, a lock of wool, + φαγεῖν, eat.] In entom.: (a) Devouring feathers or hairs and dried skins, as many coleopterous larvæ. (b) Pertaining to the Mallophaga. Also mallophagan.

Mallorquin (ma-lôr′kin), n. [< Sp. Mallorquín, < Mallorca, Majorca: see Majorcan.] Same as Majorcan.

Mallotus (ma-lō′tus), n. [NL., < Gr. μαλλωτός, furnished with wool, fleecy, < (LGr.) μαλλοῦν, clothe with wool, < μαλλός, wool.] 1. A name given by Loureiro in 1790 to Echinus, a genus of plants of the family Euphorbiaceæ, characterized by the oblong parallel anther-cells and the numerous (rarely less than fifteen) stamens. The flowers are apetalous, either dicœcious or monœcious. The plants are trees or shrubs with generally alternate leaves. The male flowers are generally small, on short pedicels in heads along a rachis; the pistillate ones fewer, on long or short pedicels. There are about 80 species, numerous in eastern India, the Malay archipelago, and Australia, with a few in Africa. One species, Echinus Philippinensis, yields the dyestuff known as kamila.

2. In ichth. (Cuvier, 1829), a genus of fishes of the family Argentinidæ, formerly placed in Salmonidæ, of which the male has a broad longitudinal villous or fleecy band of scales differentiated from the rest; the caplins. The type is Mallotus villosus, the caplin. See cut under caplin[2].

mallow (mal′ō), n. [< ME. malowe, malue, < AS. malwe, mealwe = D. maluwe = G. malve = OF. malve, F. mauve = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. malva, < L. malva, prob., with some alteration (cf. L. malope, mentioned by Pliny as one Gr. form) of the form later used as Gr., malache (also moloche), < Gr. μαλάχη, also μολόχη (later μάλβα, μάλβαξ, after L.), mallow, appar. so called from its emollient properties, or perhaps from its soft, downy leaves, < μαλάσσειν, soften, < μαλακός, soft.] Any plant of the genus Malva, or of the family Malvaceæ, the mallow family.

Branch of Mallow (Malva rotundifolia), with flowers and fruits. a, a flower; b, the fruit; c, one of the carpels.

Take malues with alle the rotes, and sethe thame in water, and wasche thi hevede therwith.
MS. Lincoln A. i. 17, f. 282. (Halliwell.)

Nowe malowe is sowe, and myntes plaunte or roote.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 84.

Common mallow, in England, Malva sylvestris; in America, sometimes, M. rotundifolia.—Country mallow, the common mallow.—Curled mallow, M. crispa, in allusion to the leaves.—Dwarf mallow, M. rotundifolia, low as compared with M. sylvestris.—False mallow, a plant of the genus Malvastrum.—Glade-mallow, a plant of the genus Napæa.—Globe mallow, a plant of the genus Sphæralcea.—Indian mallow. (a) In America, Abutilon Abutilon, introduced from India. Also velvetleaf. See American jute. (b) In England, a plant of either of the genera Sida and Urena.—Jews' mallow. See Jews'-mallow.—Marsh mallow. See marsh-mallow.—Musk-mallow, Malva moschata, so named from the scent of its foliage.—Rose-mallow, the genus Hibiscus, especially H. Moscheutos, the swamp rose-mallow.—Tree mallow, Lavatera arborea.—Venice mallow, Hibiscus Trionum, the bladder-ketmia. See cheese-cake, 3, dock[1], 2.

mallow-rose (mal′ō-rōz), n. Same as rose-mallow (which see, under mallow).

mallowwort (mal′ō-wėrt), n. Any plant of the mallow family, Malvaceæ.

malls (malz), n. pl. [A contr. of measles (formerly masels, etc.).] The measles. [Prov. Eng.]

mallum, mallus (mal′um, -us), n. [ML., of OTeut. origin; cf. Goth. mēl, time, point, mark, writing, = AS. mǣl, time, mark, etc.: see meal[2].] Among the ancient Franks, a court corresponding to the hundred court among the Anglo-Saxons.

The ordinary court of justice is the mallus or court of the hundred. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 25.

malm, maum (mäm, mâm), n. and a. [Also maulm, mawm; < ME. malm, < AS. mealm, sand, = OS. melm, dust, = OHG. MHG. melm, dust, G. (dial.) malm, something ground, also in technical use, = Icel. mālmr, sand (in local names), usually ore, metal, = Norw. malm, sand, ore, = Sw. malm, sand (in local names), = Dan. malm, ore, = Goth. malma, sand; with formative -m, from the verb represented by OHG. malan = Icel. mala = Goth. malan, grind: see meal[1], from the same verb. Hence maum, mawm, v.] I. n. 1. Earth containing a considerable quantity of chalk in fine particles; a calcareous loam, constituting in the southeastern counties of England a soil especially suited for the growth of hops; a kind of earth suitable for making the best quality of brick without any addition. The brickmakers in the vicinity of London divide the brick-earth of that region into strong clay, mild clay (or loam), and malm. Artificial malm is a mixture imitating the natural earth. See malm brick, below.

To the north-west, north, and east of the village [of Selborne] is a range of fair enclosures, consisting of what is called a white malm, a sort of rotten or rubble stone, which, when turned up to the frost and rain, moulders to pieces, and becomes manure to itself.
Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. Selborne (ed. Bohn), p. 15.

2. [cap.] The name used in Germany, and frequently by geologists writing in English on the geology of that country, for the uppermost of the three divisions of the Jurassic series, all of which at an early day received English provincial names, namely Lias, Dogger, and Malm.

The Malm of the German geologists (which is not the equivalent of the English malm rock) is also known as the White Jura and corresponds paleontologically with the Middle and Upper Oölite of England. The rock consists mostly of white limestone, with dolomitic and marly strata, and is in some places over 1,000 feet thick.

3. pl. Bricks made of malm earth, or of the artificial malm prepared by mixing clay with chalk.

For making the best quality of bricks, which are called malms, an artificial substitute is obtained.
C. T. Davis, Bricks and Tiles, p. 56.

II. a. 1. Composed of malm or calcareous loam: as, malm lands. Gilbert White.—2†. Soft; mellow. Halliwell.—3. Peaceable; quiet. [Prov. Eng.] [In the last two senses spelled maum.]—Malm brick, a brick made of true or of artificial malm, the latter of which consists of comminuted chalk and clay mixed with a little sand and with breeze, the last being composed of cinders, ashes, and fine coal. These bricks burn to a pale-brown color more or less inclined to yellow. They are made in the neighborhood of London, and are also called malms. See malm.—Malm rock, the local name of parts of the Upper Greensand, as developed from Westerham west through Surrey, Hants, and Sussex. Also called malmstone.

Near Westerham we find harder beds below, which rapidly acquire importance farther west, and become there the chief part of the formation [the Upper Greensand]. These beds are known as firestone and malm rock, and there also occur smaller quantities of blue rag and chert. The firestone is a light-coloured calcareous sandstone much used for building. The malm rock much resembles it, but is slightly more chalky-looking.
Topley, Geol. of the Weald, p. 153.

★malm†, maum† (mäm, mâm), v. t. [In the quot. spelled maum; < malm, maum, a.; cf. malmy, 2.] To handle with sticky hands; "paw." [Low.]

Don't be mauming and gauming a body so! can't you keep your filthy hands to yourself?
Swift, Polite Conversation, ii. (Davies.)

malmag (mal'mag), n. [Phil. Sp. malmay.] The specter, Tarsius spectrum, a small lemuroid quadruped. See Tarsius.

malmarsh (mal'märsh), n. Same as mallemuck. Montagu.

malmignatte (mal-mi-nyat'), n. [Also malmigniatte.] A spider, Theridion or Latrodectus malmignattus, a small black species spotted with red. It is one of a genus of spiders widely distributed in Europe, Africa, Asia, New Zealand, and the United States. Its venom is much more poisonous than that of any other animal, considering the diminutive size of the spider and the extremely minute quantity that will sometimes prove fatal. See katipo.

malming (mä'ming), n. [< malm + -ing.] The preparation of artificial malm by mixing chalk and clay reduced to pulp, and allowing the mixture to consolidate by evaporation.

malmock† (mal'mok), n. A variant of mallemuck.

malmsey (mäm'zi, formerly malm'si), n. [Formerly malmsie, malmesie, malmasye; < ME. malvesie, malweysy = MD. malvaseye, D. malvezy, malvazy, malvazier = G. Dan. malvasier = Sw. malvasir, < F. malvesie, malvoisie = Sp. malvasía, marvasía = Pg. malvasia (ML. malvaticum), < It. malvasia, a wine so called from Malvasia or Napoli di Malvasia, < NGr. Μονεμβασία, a seaport on the southeastern coast of Laconia, Greece, contr. of μόνη ἐμβασία, 'single entrance': Gr. μόνη, fem. of μόνος, single (see monad); ἐμβασία, entrance, < ἐμβαίνειν, enter, go in, < ἐν, in, + βαίνειν, go.] 1†. A kind of grape.

Upon that hyll is a cite called Malvasia, where first grew Malmasye, and yet doth; howbeit it groweth now [1506] more plenteously in Camdia and Modena, and no where ellys. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 12.

Ther [in Candia] groweth the Voyne that ys callyd Malweysy and muskedell.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 20.

2. A wine, usually sweet, strong, and of high flavor, originally and still made in Greece, but now especially in the Canary and Madeira islands, and also in the Azores and in Spain. The name is given somewhat loosely to such wines, and is used in combination, as Malmsey-Madeira. Compare malvasia.

A Cask, through want of vse grow'n fusty, Makes with his stink the best Greeke Malmsey musty.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

By this hand,
I love thee next to malmsey in a morning,
Of all things transitory.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, iv. 2.

malmstone (mäm'stōn), n. Same as malm rock (which see, under malm).

Some varieties of the malmstones which form part of the so-called Upper Greensand of Surrey, Hampshire, and Berkshire. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 406.

malmy (mä'mi), a. [< malm + -y[1].] 1. Consisting of, containing, or resembling malm: as, a malmy soil.

The eastern portion forming the Vale of Petersfield, and comprising only about 50,000 acres, rests on the Wealden formation, and is a grey sandy loam provincially called malmy land, lying on a soft sand rock.
Encyc. Brit., XI. 430.

2. Clammy; sticky. [Prov. Eng.]

malnutrition (mal-nū-trish'ọn), n. [< mal- + nutrition.] Imperfect nutrition; defect of sustenance from imperfect assimilation of food.

Conical cornea is more often met with among persons who have had diseases of malnutrition.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXVIII. 510.

Malnutrition of muscles is a factor which ought not to be forgotten. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXI. 100.

malodor, malodour (mal-ō'dọr), n. [Formerly also maleodor; < mal- + odor.] An offensive odor; a stench.

Her breath, heavy with the malodor of nicotine, almost strangled him. The Century, XXIX. 681.

malodorous (mal-ō'dọr-us), a. [< malodor + -ous.] Having a bad or offensive odor, either literally or figuratively: as, a malodorous reputation.

A pestilent malodorous home of dirt and disease.
The Century, XXVII. 326.

malodorousness (mal-ō'dọr-us-nes), n. The quality or state of being malodorous, or offensive to smell.

malomaxillary (mā-lō-mak'si-lā-ri), a. Same as malarimaxillary. H. Gray.

malont. Contracted from me alone. Chaucer.

Maloo climber. See Bauhinia.

Malope (mal'ọ-pē), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. malope, mallow.] 1. A genus of plants belonging to the Malvaceæ, or the mallow family, type of the tribe Malopeæ, characterized by a style which is longitudinally stigmatose, and by having three distinct bractlets. They are annual herbs, with entire or three-parted leaves and pedunculate, usually showy, violet or rose-colored flowers. There are 3 species, which are confined to the Mediterranean region, and are often cultivated for the beauty of the large flowers. M. trifida, with flowers of rose-color or white, is sometimes called three-lobed malope. The other species are M. malacoides, mallow-like malope, and M. multiflora.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Malopeæ (ma-lō'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1828), < Malope + -eæ.] A tribe of malvaceous plants characterized by an indefinite number of carpels, irregularly grouped in a head, with solitary ascending ovules. It embraces 3 genera, of which Malope is the type, ★and 7 species.

Malo-Russian (mā-lō-rush'an), n. [< Russ. Malorossiya, Little Russia (Malorossiĭskiĭ, Little-Russian), < malisiĭ, in comp. malo-, adv. malo, little, + Rossiya, Russia: see Russian.] Little-Russian (which see, under Russian).

In Malo-Russian, g is pronounced h, as aharod, a garden. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 149.

Malpighia (mal-pig'i-ạ), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after Marcello Malpighi.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, type of the family Malpighiaceæ and the tribe Malpighieæ, characterized by having an entire 2- or 3-celled ovary, terminal free styles with obtuse stigmas, a calyx with from 6 to 10 glands, and a drupaceous fruit with 3 crested seeds. They are trees or shrubs with opposite leaves, sometimes covered with stinging hairs, and red, white, or rose-colored flowers in axillary or terminal clusters. There are about 24 species, all natives of tropical America. M. glabra is the Surinam cherry, M. urens the cowhage-cherry, and M. punicifolia the Barbados cherry.

Malpighiaceæ (mal-pig-i-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Ventenat, 1799), < Malpighia + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants belonging to the order Geraniales, typified by the genus Malpighia. It is characterized by a 5-parted calyx, some or all of the sepals usually with two glands, by having three carpels, which are either united or distinct, and by solitary ovules without albumen. The order embraces 52 genera and about 700 species, most numerous in the tropics. They are herbs or shrubs, often climbing, with leaves usually opposite and entire, and glandular on the stalk or under side, and yellow or red (rarely white or blue) flowers, commonly growing in terminal clusters.

malpighiaceous (mal-pig-i-ā'shius), a. [< Malpighia + -aceous.] In bot., pertaining to or characteristic of plants of the order Malpighiaceæ: specifically applied to hairs formed as in the genus Malpighia, which are attached by the middle, and lie parallel to the surface on which they grow.

Malpighian (mal-pig'i-ạn), a. [< Malpighi (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Marcello Malpighi (1628–94), an Italian anatomist and physiologist: applied in anatomy to several structures discovered or particularly investigated by him, as follows.—Malpighian body, one of the glomeruli of the kidney surrounded by its capsule. These form the terminations of the branches of the uriniferous tubules, occur in the cortical substance of the kidney, and are about $\frac{1}{100}$ of an inch in diameter. They are formed of the expanded end of the tube invaginated by the bunch of blood-vessels constituting the glomerulus, which thus are embraced in a double epithelial sac, and the blood is separated from the lumen of the tubule by the vascular wall and the epithelium of the inner layer of the capsule. There is reason to think that these bodies do most of the secretion of the water and less important salts of the urine, the remainder of the work of secreting the urine being done by the epithelial cells of the uriniferous tubules.—Malpighian cæca or filaments. Same as Malpighian tubes.—Malpighian capsule. See Malpighian body.—Malpighian corpuscle. (a) A Malpighian body of the kidney. (b) A lymphoid corpuscle of the spleen. See corpuscle.—Malpighian layer, the rete mucosum; the lowermost layer of the epidermis; the stratum spinosum. Also called rete Malpighii. See skin.—Malpighian pyramids, in anat., the pale-reddish conical masses forming the medullary part of the kidney, whose apices project into the calyces of the pelvis of the kidney, and are called papillæ.—Malpighian tubes or vessels, certain appendages of the alimentary canal of insects. They are cæcal convoluted tubes, immediately behind the posterior aperture of the stomach, and are generally regarded as representing the kidneys. See cut at Blattidæ.—Malpighian tuft, the glomerulus, or vascular network or plexus, in a Malpighian body.

Malpighian capsule, a, with its contained glomerulus, h, and the beginning of the tubule, b, into which it opens; c, d, epithelium in place; e, epithelium of the tubule detached; f, termination of renal artery; g, beginning of renal vein; h, the glomerulus. (Magnified about 300 diameters.)

Malpighieæ (mal-pi-gī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Malpighia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants belonging to the natural order Malpighiaceæ, of which Malpighia is the type. It is characterized by having ten stamens, usually all perfect, and often with appendaged anthers; by three styles, which are almost always distinct; and by having carpels inserted on the flat receptacle, distinct or united in the fruit, and forming fleshy or woody drupes with from one to three cells.

malposition (mal-pō-zish'ọn), n. [< mal- + position.] A wrong position; a misplacement, as of a part of the body or of a fetus.

Malpositions of the eye, such as squinting, are the result of too great contraction of one of the recti muscles, usually the internal. Le Conte. Sight, p. 20.

malpractice (mal-prak'tis), n. [< mal- + practice.] 1. Misbehavior; evil practice; practice contrary to established rules.

Fanny was almost ready to tell fibs to screen her brother's malpractices from her mamma.
Thackeray, The Kickleburys on the Rhine.

2. Specifically, bad professional treatment of disease, pregnancy, or bodily injury, from reprehensible ignorance or carelessness, or with criminal intent.

malpractitioner (mal-prak-tish'ọn-ėr), n. [< mal- + practitioner, after malpractice.] A physician who is guilty of malpractice.

malpresentation (mal-prē-zen-tā'shọn), n. [< F. mal- + presentation.] In obstet., abnormal presentation in childbirth, as of a shoulder.

malpropriety (mal-prō-prī'e-ti), n. [= F. malproprieté; as mal- and propriety.] Want of proper condition; slovenliness; dirtiness. [Rare.]

The whole interior had a harmonious air of sloth, stupidity, and malpropriety. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xvii.

malsker†, v. i. [ME. malskren, malscren, masken; < AS. malscran*, in verbal n. malscrung (= OHG. mascrunc), fascination; cf. OS. malsk, proud, = Goth. malsks*, foolish.] To wander.

The ledez of that lyttel toun wern lopen out for drede,
In-to that malscrande mere, marred bylyue.
Alliterative Poems, (ed. Morris), ii. 991.

He hade missed is mayne & malskrid a-boute, & how the werwolf wan him bi with a wilde hert.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 416.

malstick (mâl'stik), n. See mahlstick.

malström, n. See maelstrom.

malt[1] (mâlt), n. and a. [Formerly also mault, ★Sc. maut; < ME. malt, < AS. mealt (= OS. malt = D. mout = MLG. molt, malt = OHG. MHG. G. malz = Icel. Dan. Sw. malt; cf. F. malt = Sp. Pg. It. malto, < Teut.), < meltan (pret. mealt), melt, dissolve: see melt.] I. n. 1. Grain in which, by partial germination, arrested at the proper stage by heat, the starch is converted into saccharine matter (grape-sugar), the unfermented solution of the latter being the sweet-wort of the brewer. By the addition of hops, and the subsequent processes of cooling, fermentation, and clarification, the wort is converted into porter, ale, or beer. The alcoholic fermentation of the wort, without the addition of hops, and distillation yield crude whisky. Barley is the grain most used for malting in the manufacture of beer; but wheat, rye, and other grains are largely malted for whisky. Barley yields about 92 per cent. of its weight of dried malt.

Some make the Egyptians first inuenters of Wine . . . and of Beere, to which end they first made Mault of Barley for such places as wanted Grapes.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 582.

The ale shall ne'er be brewin o' malt.
The Enchanted Ring (Child's Ballads, III. 53).

2. Liquor produced from malt, as ale, porter, or beer.

Scho suld haif found me meil and malt.
Johnie Armstrang (Child's Ballads, VI. 48).

Blown malt, malt dried in a kiln in which the heat is raised quickly to 100° F., and then lowered. It is so called from its distended appearance. Encyc. Brit.— Malt-cleaning machine, in a brewery, a form of grain-cleaner for freeing barley, previous to malting, from all extraneous substances, such as other grain, seeds of grass and weeds, dust, and foul matters; a cleaning and sorting machine.

II. a. Pertaining to, containing, or made with malt.— Malt liquor, a general term for an alcoholic beverage produced merely by the fermentation of malt, as opposed to those obtained by the distillation of malt or mash.

malt[1] (mâlt), v. [< malt[1], n.] I. trans. To convert (grain) into malt. The steps in the process of malting are four: First, steeping in water from twenty-four to forty hours, by which the grain takes up from 10 to 30 per cent. of water, swells, and begins to germinate. Second, couching, in which the steeped grain is piled in heaps on a floor, usually made of flagstones, and wherein the growth of the rootlets is aided by heat generated in the mass. Third, flooring, in which the germinating grain is spread upon a floor in charges called floors, and stirred to expose it to air, and in which the growth of the rootlets is checked and the germination of the acrospires is carried to the desired limit. Fourth, drying, in which the germination is completely arrested by heat in a malt-kiln. The maltster decides, from the length and appearance of the acrospires as to when the conversion of the starch has been carried to the right limit. The dried acrospires and the rootlets are broken off by handling in the kiln, and are removed by sifting. The chemical changes effected by the partial germination and subsequent treatment of the grain are chiefly the conversion of the azotized substances into diastase, the conversion of the starch into grape-sugar by the action of the diastase, and the imparting of color and flavor to the malt in the kiln. The malt is either pale or dark in color, according to the degree of heat and the length of time it is exposed to heat in the kiln; and a peculiar flavor is derived from empyreumatic oil generated in the husk.

II. intrans. 1. To become malt; be converted into malt.

To house it green . . . will make it malt worse.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. To drink malt liquor. [Humorous or low.]

She drank nothing lower than Curaçoa, Maraschino, or pink Noyau,
And on principle never malted.
Hood, Miss Kilmansegg, Her Birth.

Well, for my part, I malts. Marryat, Jacob Faithful.

malt[2]†. An obsolete preterit of melt[1]. Chaucer.

maltalent† (mal'ta-lent), n. [Also maletalent; < ME. maletalent, < OF. maltalent, ill-humor, anger; as mal- + talent.] Evil disposition or inclination; ill-will; resentment; displeasure; spleen.

Wax he rody for shame, and loked on hym with maltalent, and yef thei hadde be a-lone he wolde with hym haue foughten. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 536.

As she that hadde it al to-rent,
For angre and for maltalent.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 330.

So forth he went
With heavy look and lumpish pace, that plaine
In him bewraid great grudge and maltalent.
Spenser, F. Q., III. iv. 61.

That is the lot of them that the Black Douglas bears maltalent against. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth, xii.

maltalentive†, a. [ME. maletalentif, < OF. maltalentif, < maltalent, ill humor, anger: see maltalent.] Angry; resentful.

And [they] ronne to-geder wroth and maletalentif that oon a-gein that other, and that oon desiraunt of pris and honour, and that other covetouse to a-venge hys shame and his harme. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 338.

malt-barn (mâlt'bärn), n. Same as malt-house.

malt-drier (mâlt'drī″ėr), n. An apparatus for artificially drying malt in order to arrest the process of germination and the chemical change in the constituents of the grain. E. H. Knight.

malt-dust (mâlt'dust), n. The refuse of malt after brewing; spent malt.

Malt-dust is an active manure frequently used as a top-dressing, especially for fruit trees in pots.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 233.

malter (mâl'tėr), n. Same as maltster. [Rare.]

Maltese (mâl-tēs' or -tēz'), a. and n. [< Malta (< ★L. Melita, Melite, Gr. Μελίτη) (see def.) + -ese.] I. a. Pertaining to Malta, an island in the Mediterranean, formerly belonging to the Knights Hospitalers or Knights of Malta (1530–1798), afterward to France, and since 1800 to Great Britain, or to the group of islands of which it is the chief.— Maltese cat, dog, stone, etc. See the nouns.— Maltese cross. See cross of Malta, under cross[1].

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of the island of Malta.— 2. The language spoken by the natives of Malta. Its chief element is a corrupt form of Arabic mixed with Italian.

malt-extract (mâlt'eks″trakt), n. A concentrated unfermented infusion of malt. It is used in medicine in cases where it is desirable to further the nutrition.

malt-floor (mâlt'flōr), n. 1. A perforated iron or tile floor in the chamber of a malt-kiln, through which the heat ascends from the furnace below, and dries the grain laid upon it.— 2. A floor on which grain is spread to undergo partial germination in the process of malting.— 3. A charge of grain spread on a floor of a malt-house to undergo partial germination. See malt and ★malting.

maltha (mal'thä), n. [< L. maltha (see def.), < Gr. μάλθα, μάλθη, a mixture of wax and pitch used for calking ships.] A fluid hydrocarbon midway in consistency between asphaltum and petroleum. From its tarry appearance, it is sometimes called mineral tar; it is the brea of the Mexican Spanish. By the Romans the word maltha was used as the name of various cements, stuccos, and other preparations of a similar kind employed for repairing cisterns, roofs, etc., and of some of these what is now known as maltha, or some other form of bitumen, in all probability constituted a part. Asphaltum and maltha were also used from the earliest times (as stated in Genesis with regard to the building of the Tower of Babel) for the same purpose for which our common mortar is employed, namely to bind together stones and bricks.

malthe[1]†, n. [ML., < L. malthæ: see maltha.] Mortar; cement.

Convenient it is to knowe, of bathes
. . . what malthes hoote and colde
Are able, ther as chynyng clifte or scathe is To make it hoole.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 41.

Malthe[2] (mal'thē), n. [NL., < Gr. μάλθη or μάλθα, a fish so named, supposed by some to have been the angler, Lophius.] A genus of pediculate fishes, typical of the family Maltheidæ (Ogcocephalidæ): the bat-fishes. M. vespertilio inhabits the West Indian seas. See cuts under bat-fish. Properly Ogcocephalus.

maltheid (mal'thē-id), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Maltheidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Maltheidæ.

Maltheidæ (mal-thē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Malthe[2] + -idæ.] A family of pediculate fishes with branchial apertures in the superior axilla of the pectoral fins, the anterior dorsal ray in a cavity overhung by the anterior margin of the forehead, the mouth subterminal or inferior; the bat-fishes. It includes marine fishes of remarkable aspect. Properly Ogcocephalidæ.

maltheiform (mal'thē-i-fôrm), a. Resembling in form a fish of the genus Malthe.

Maltheinæ (mal-thē-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Malthe[2] + -inæ.] A subfamily of Maltheidæ, having the body divided into a cordiform disk and a stout caudal portion, the frontal region elevated, and the snout more or less attenuated. It includes a few American marine forms inhabiting shallow water.

maltheine (mal'thē-in), a. and n. [< Malthe[2] + -ine[1].] I. a. Pertaining to the Maltheinæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A bat-fish of the subfamily Maltheinæ.

maltheoid (mal'thē-oid), a. and n. I. a. Having the form or characters of the Maltheidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Maltheidæ; a maltheid.

malt-horse (mâlt'hôrs), n. A horse employed in grinding malt by working a treadmill or winch; hence, a slow, heavy horse.

Mome, malt-horse, capon, coxcomb, idiot, patch!
Shak., C. of E., iii. 1. 32.

He! why, he has no more judgment than a malt-horse.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 4.

malt-house (mâlt'hous), n. [< ME. malthous, < AS. mealthūs, < mealt, malt, + hūs, house.] A house in which malt is made.

Malthusian (mal-thū'si-an), a. and n. [< Malthus (see def.) + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Rev. T. R. Malthus (1766–1834), an English economist, or to the doctrines set forth in his "Essay on the Principle of Population." In this work he first made prominent the fact that population, unless hindered by positive checks, as wars, famines, etc., or by preventive checks, as social customs that prevent early marriage, tends to increase at a higher rate than the means of subsistence can, under the most favorable circumstances, be made to increase. As a remedy he advocated the principle that society should aim to diminish the sum of vice and misery, and check the growth of population, by the discouragement of early and improvident marriages, and by the practice of moral self-restraint.

II. n. A follower of Malthus; a believer in Malthusianism.

Malthusianism (mal-thū'si-an-izm), n. [< Malthusian + -ism.] The theory of the relation of population to means of subsistence taught by Malthus. See Malthusian, a.

maltine (mâl'tin), n. [< malt[1] + -ine[2].] A medicinal preparation made by digesting sprouting malt in water, expressing the solution, precipitating with alcohol, and drying the precipitate, which is impure diastase.

malting (mâl'ting), n. [Verbal n. of malt[1], v.] 1. The artificial production of germination in grain for the purpose of converting its starch into the greatest possible amount of sugar, as a preparation for brewing, or the conversion by fermentation of this sugar into alcohol.

Malting consists of four processes, steeping, couching, flooring, and kiln-drying. Encyc. Brit., IV. 267.

2. A place where malting is carried on. [Rare and inaccurate.]

The town also possesses brass foundries, maltings, lime-kilns, and brickyards. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 506.

malt-kiln (mâlt'kil), n. A heated chamber in which malt is dried to check germination. Some kilns are fitted with machinery for stirring the malt on the floor of the kiln, this mechanism being called a malt-turner. A smaller apparatus with mechanical devices for stirring the malt is commonly known as a malt-drier.

malt-mad (mâlt'mad), a. Maddened with drink; addicted to drink; drunken.

These English are so malt-mad, there's no meddling with 'em. Fletcher, Pilgrim, iii. 7.

maltman (mâlt'man), n.; pl. maltmen (-men). A maltster. Gascoigne, Steele Glas, 79.

malt-master (mâlt'mâs″tėr), n. A master maltster.

If the poor cannot reach the price, the maltmaster will.
Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 246. (Davies.)

malt-mill (mâlt'mil), n. A mill for grinding malt.

maltose (mâl'tōs), n. [< malt[1] + -ose.] A sugar ($C_{12}H_{22}O_{11} + H_2O$) which forms hard white crystals, is directly fermented by yeast, and is closely like glucose in its properties. It is produced from starch paste by the action of malt or diastase.

malt-rake (mâlt'rāk), n. An implement for stirring malt on the floor of a malt-kiln. A hoe-shaped part scrapes the grain from the floor, and it falls through fingers set above and behind the hoe.

maltreat (mal-trēt'), v. t. [< mal- + treat.] To treat ill; abuse; treat roughly, rudely, or with unkindness.

Yorick indeed was never better served in his life;— but it was a little hard to maltreat him after, and plunder him after he was laid in his grave.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, ii. 17.

maltreatment (mal-trēt'ment), n. [< maltreat- + -ment.] The act of maltreating, or the condition of being maltreated; ill treatment; ill usage; abuse.

★malt-screen (mâlt'skrēn), n. A machine for freeing malt or barley from foreign matters.

maltster (mâlt'stėr), n. [< ME. maltster; < malt[1] + -ster.] A maker of or dealer in malt. Rarely also malter.

malt-surrogate (mâlt'sur″ō-gāt), n. Any substitute, as corn, potatoes, rice, or potato-starch, used in the manufacture of beer in place of a part of the malt required for the normal manufacture.

malt-tea (mâlt'tē), n. The liquid infusion of the mash in brewing; water impregnated with the valuable part of the malt, leaving behind the husks or grains. See grain[1], 6, and wort[2].

malt-turner (mâlt'tėr″nėr), n. A mechanical device for turning malt as it is heated in the kiln. See malt-kiln, and compare malt-rake.

maltworm† (mâlt'wėrm), n. A person addicted to the use of malt liquor.

Then doth she trowle to me the bowle,
E'en as a mault-worme sholde.
Bp. Still, Gammer Gurton's Needle, ii. (song).

I am joined with . . . none of these mad, mustachio, purple-hued malt-worms. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 83.

malty (mâl'ti), a. [< malt[1] + -y[1].] Pertaining to, composed of, or produced from malt.

Backward and forward rush mysterious men with no names, who fly about all those particular parts of the country on which Doodle is . . . throwing himself in an auriferous and malty shower. Dickens, Bleak House, xl.

malulella (mal-ū-lel'ä), n.; pl. malulellæ (-ē). [NL. (Packard, 1883), double dim. of L. mala, jaw: see malar.] An appendix of the front edge of the inner stipes of the deutomala of a myriapod. See deutomala.

Differentiated from the front edge of the inner stipes [of the deutomala of a myriapod] is a piece usually separated by suture, which, as we understand it, is the stilus lingualis of Meinert; it is our malulella.
A. S. Packard, Proc. Amer. Philos. Soc., June, 1883, p. 200.

★malum (mā'lum), n.; pl. mala (-lą̈). [L., an evil, neut. of malus, evil, bad: see mal, male[3], malice, etc.] In law, an evil.—Malum in se, a thing unlawful because an evil in itself.—Malum prohibitum, a prohibited wrong; an act wrong because forbidden by law.

malure†, n. [ME., < OF. maleur, maleure, malure, F. malheur, misfortune, < mal (< L. malus), bad, + heur, < L. augurium, luck: see augury.] Misfortune.

I woful wight ful of malure.
The Isle of Ladies, l. 601.

maluredt†, a. [Early mod. E. maleuryd; < malure + -ed[2].] Ill-fortuned.

Male vryd was your fals entent
For to offend your presydent,
Your soueravne lord most reuerent,
Your lord, your brother, and your Regent.
Skelton, Lament againste the Scottes, l. iii.

Malurinæ (mal-ū-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Malurus + -inæ.] A group of oscine passerine birds, commonly referred to the family Sylviidæ or Lusciniidæ, typified by the genus Malurus; the soft-tailed warblers. They are characteristic of the Australian region, and include some of the most beautiful of warblers. Those of the remarkable genus Stipiturus are known as emu-wrens. (See cut under Stipiturus.) The limits of the group are not well defined, and the term is used with varying latitude by different writers.

malurine (mal'ū-rin), a. Belonging to or having the characters of the Malurinæ.

Perhaps the most curious example of the malurine birds is the beautiful little Emeu wren.
J. G. Wood, Illus. Nat. Hist., II. 274.

maluroust, a. [ME. malurous*, malerous, < OF. maleuros, maleurous, maleureus, etc., F. malheureux, unfortunate, unhappy, wretched, < maleur, misfortune: see malure.] Wretched; wicked.

Iff I thaim for-gatte I were malerous.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 6473.

Malurus (mā-lū'rus), n. [NL., for Malacurus* < Gr. μαλακός, soft, + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of Malurinæ, founded by Vieillot in 1816. The type-species is M. cyaneus of Australia, a very beautiful little bird known as the superb warbler or blue wren.

Malva (mal'vą̈), n. [NL. (Malpighi, 1675), < L. malva, mallow: see mallow.] A genus of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants belonging to the Malvaceæ, or mallow family, the tribe Malveæ, and the subtribe Malvinæ. It is characterized by having the styles stigmatous along the inner sides, by three distinct bractlets growing beneath the calyx, and by carpels which are naked within and have no beaks. About 30 species are known, natives of the temperate regions of the old world. They are herbs with leaves which are usually angularly lobed or dissected, and purple, rose-colored, or white flowers with emarginate petals, growing in the axils, either solitary or in clusters. The name mallow belongs peculiarly, though not exclusively, to this genus. See mallow and cheese-cake, 3.

Malvaceæ (mal-vā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), fem. pl. of L. malvaceus, malvaceous: see malvaceous and -aceæ.] A large family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants belonging to the order Malvales, typified by the genus Malva, and characterized by monadelphous stamens with one-celled anthers. They are herbs, shrubs, or trees with alternate leaves, which are entire, much divided, or palmately lobed, and regular five-parted flowers, almost always showy, and usually purple, rose-colored, or yellow. The uniform character of the family is to abound in mucilage and to be totally destitute of all unwholesome qualities; many are cultivated for ornament, and many others are used medicinally. The cotton-plant, Gossypium, belongs to this family, as do also the hollyhock, the hibiscus, the abutilon, and nearly all the plants called mallows. The family embraces 44 genera and nearly 800 species, found everywhere throughout the world, except in the arctic regions.

malvaceous (mal-vā'shius), a. [< L. malvaceus, of mallows, < malva, mallow: see mallow.] Pertaining or belonging to the family Malvaceæ, or mallow family.

Malvales (mal-vā'lēs), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), < L. malva, mallow: see Malva.] An order of dicotyledonous, archichlamydeous, chiefly choripetalous plants. It is characterized by the valvate calyx-lobes or sepals, which are five in number, rarely fewer; by having the petals as many as the sepals or sometimes wanting; by stamens which are indefinite in number or monadelphous; and by an ovary with from three to an indefinite number of cells, rarely fewer. The order embraces 8 families, of which the Malvaceæ, Sterculiaceæ, and Tiliaceæ are the most important.

malvasia (mal-va-sē'a), n. [It.: see malmsey.] Originally, a wine of Napoli di Malvasia in the Morea, Greece; now, a name given also to some other wines, especially to certain Italian and Sicilian wines, as to a brand of Marsala, of similar quality, sweet and somewhat heady. See malmsey.

Malvastrum (mal-vas'trum), n. [NL. (Asa Gray, 1849), < Malva + Gr. ἄστρον, star (alluding to the star-like arrangement of the bracts).] A large genus of plants of the family Malvaceæ, tribe Malveæ, and subtribe Malvinæ; the false mallows. It is characterized by styles which are branched at the apex and have terminal capitate stigmas, and by from one to three distinct bractlets under the calyx, or the latter sometimes wanting. They are tall or low herbs, with leaves which are divided, or entire and cordate, and scarlet, orange, or yellow flowers, which are axillary or grow in terminal spikes. There are about 75 species, growing in North and South America, and in Africa. See hollow-stock.

Malveæ (mal'vē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Saint-Hilaire, 1825), < Malva + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Malvaceæ, characterized by the columns of stamens being anther-bearing at the apex, the styles having as many branches as there are carpels, and the cotyledons foliaceous and variously folded. The tribe, of which Malva is the type, embraces 23 genera and about 572 species. To it belong many of the important plants of the family.

malversation (mal-vėr-sā'shọn), n. [< F. malversation = Sp. malversacion = Pg. malversação, evil conduct, < L. male, badly, + versatio(n-), a turning, < versari, turn about, occupy oneself: see converse, conversation.] Evil conduct; fraudulent or tricky dealing; especially, misbehavior in an office or employment, as by fraud, breach of trust, extortion, etc.

A man turned out of his employment . . . for malversation in office. Burke, On Fox's East India Bill.

malvesiet, malvesyet, malvyseyt, n. Middle English forms of malmsey.

malvoisie, n. [F.: see malmsey.] Same as malmsey.

mam[1] (mam), n. A colloquial or childish word for mother. See mama.

It began to speake and call him dad and her mam.
Greene, Dorastus and Fawnia (1588).

mam[2], n. Same as ma'am, contraction of madam.

mama, mamma[1] (mą-mä' or mä'mą̈), n. [Prop. mama, but more commonly mamma, in simulation of the L. form; also in dim. or childish form mammy (q. v.), and abbr. mam (see mam[1]); = D. Marathi māmā, a maid-servant; prop. a child's term for 'mother,' being the meaningless infantile articulation ma ma adopted (out of many similar infantile articulations) by mothers, nurses, etc., as if the infant's name for its mother or nurse, and so later used by the child. The simple syllable ma is also used (see ma[3]); even a Gr. μᾶ appears for μάτηρ, μήτηρ. Cf. papa, dad[1] (dadda), similarly developed; cf. Hind. māmā, maternal uncle; western Australian mamman, father. A similar word is used to mean 'breast': see mamma[2].] Mother: a word used chiefly in address and familiar intercourse, especially by and with infants, children, and young people.

When the babe shall . . . begin to tattle and call hir Mamma. Lyly, Euphues (ed. Arber), p. 129.

Pleas'd Cupid heard, and check'd his Mother's Pride:
And who's blind now, Mamma, the Urchin cry'd.
Prior, Venus Mistaken.

C. Smart, tr. of Phædrus (1765), p. 115.

mamaluke (mam'ą-lūk), n. See mameluke.

mamblet, v. i. [< ME. mamelen, var. momelen, mumble: see mumble.] To talk indistinctly; mumble.

Adam, while he spak nouȝt, had paradys at wille;
Ac whan he mameled aboute mete, and entermeted to knowe
The wisdom and the witte of God, he was put fram blisse.
Piers Plowman (B), xi. 408.

The Almighty . . . could rather be content the angell of the church of Laodicea should be quite cold, than in such a mambling of profession.
Bp. Hall, Christian Moderation, ii. 2.

Mambrino, 13th century.

mambrino (mam-brē'nō), n. A name given to the iron hat (chapel-de-fer), derived from its resemblance to the barber's basin in "Don Quixote." Archæol. Inst. Jour., VIII. 319.

mamelt, v. i. A variant of mamble.

mamelon (mam'ę-lọn), n. [< F. mamelon, nipple, teat, pap, a small conical hill, < mamelle, the breast, < L. mamma, the breast: see mamma[2].] A small hill or mound with a round top; a hemispherical elevation: so called from its resemblance to a woman's breast.

Our tents were pitched on another mamelon, some distance from the castle.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 201.

mameluco (mam-e-lö'kō), n. [Also mamalucco. Pg. (in Brazil), lit. a mameluke: see mameluke.] In Brazil, the offspring of a white and a Brazilian Indian.

I have seen the white merchant, the negro husbandman, the mameluco, the mulatto, and the Indian, all sitting side by side. Bates, Brazil, p. 21.

★mameluke (mam'ę-lūk), n. [Formerly also mamaluke, mameluck, mamlouk, mamlock, mamoloke, mamelak, mamelek, memlook, etc.; < F. mamaluc, now mameluk = Sp. Pg. mameluco = It. mammaluco = Turk. mamelek, < Ar. mamlūk, a purchased slave, a mameluke, < malaka, possess.] 1. Any male servant or slave, usually a Circassian, belonging to the household or the retinue of a bey.

In Turkey, it was the custom in the houses of the great to have a number of young men, who in Egypt were called Mamelukes, after that gallant corps had been destroyed.
R. Curzon, Monast. in the Levant, p. 58.

2. [cap.] A member of a corps of cavalry formerly existing in Egypt, whose chiefs were long the sovereign rulers of the country. They originated with a body of Mingrelians, Turks, and other slaves, who were sold by Jenghiz Khan to the Egyptian sultan in the thirteenth century. About 1251 they established their government in Egypt by making one of their own number sultan. Their government was overthrown by Selim I. of Turkey in 1517, but they formed part of the Egyptian army until 1811, when Mehemet Ali destroyed most of them by a general massacre.

And as we come out of the bote we were receyved by ye Mamolukes and Sarrasyns, and put into an olde caue, by name and tale, there scryuan euer wrytyng our names man by man as we entred in the presens of the sayd Lordes. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 16.

Mameluke bey, one of the Mameluke rulers of Egypt.

The servile rulers known as mameluke beys, and to the Egyptians as ghuzz.
R. F. Burton, Arabian Nights, V. 12, note.

mamerit, n. [ME., < OF. mahomerie, mahommerie, mahonnerie, meomerie, etc., a Mohammedan or other temple, a pagan temple, Mahometry, < Mahomet, etc., Mahomet, Mohammed: see mammet, maumet.] A pagan temple.

Beves of Hamtoun, p. 54. (Halliwell.)

mamilla, mamillary, etc. See mammilla, etc.

Mamillaria (mam-i-lā'ri-ą̈), n. [NL. (Haworth, 1812), so called in allusion to the protuberances on the stem; < L. mamilla, breast, nipple: see mammilla.] An untenable name for Coryphantha, a genus of Cactaceæ. It is characterized by a short stem, with the flowers in the axils of the tubercles, which are mammiform, elongated or angular, rarely uniting to form a fleshy ridge, and have a cushion-like apex, bearing a tuft of radiating spines; the flowers are usually arranged in a transverse zone, and have an immersed smooth ovary. About 600 species have been described, natives of Mexico, though some are found in the southern part of the United States, the West Indies, and one in South America. The plants rarely exceed 6 or 8 inches in height. The stems are simple, tufted, globose, or cylindrical, and covered with tubercles, from the axils of which arises a zone of white, yellow, red, or rose-colored flowers, which remain open during the day only. See nipple-cactus.

mamisht, a. [Origin obscure.] Foolish; effeminate. Davies.

But why urge I this? None but some mamish monsters can question it. Bp. Hall, Works, V. 464.

mamma[1], n. See mama.

mamma[2] (mam'ą̈), n. [L. mamma (> It. mamma = Sp. Pg. mama, L. dim. mamilla, > F. mamelle = AS. mamme) = Gr. μάμμη, the breast, pap. See mama.] 1. Pl. mammæ (-ē). The mammary gland and associated structures; the characteristic organ of the class Mammalia, which in the female secretes milk for the nourishment of the young; a breast or udder. The mamma is essentially a conglomerate gland, consisting of lobes and lobules, secreting milk, which is conveyed from the ultimate ramifications of the organ by a system of converging lactiferous or galactophorous ducts, to be discharged through one or several main orifices at the summit of the gland, where is the nipple or mammilla. The mamma is subcutaneous, and may be regarded as a highly developed and specialized sebaceous follicle. Mammæ vary much in number and position: they may be 2, 4, 6, 8, to 12 or more, usually an even number, being paired, and may be pectoral, axillary, ventral or abdominal, or inguinal. They are sometimes quite high on the sides of the animal, but are never dorsal. An apparently single and median mamma, as the udder of the cow, results from the coalescence of as many mammæ as there are teats. In marsupials they are contained in the pouch, and may be circularly or irregularly disposed, or of odd number. In monotremes they are devoid of a nipple, whence the name Amasta for these animals. The mamma develops at puberty, and comes into functional activity during gestation. The structure is common to both sexes, but as a rule remains rudimentary and functionless in the male.

2. [cap.] A genus of sea-snails of the family Naticidæ. Klein, 1753.

mammal (mam′al), n. and a. [First used in pl., mammals, as Eng. for NL. Mammalia, Linnæus' name for the class: < L. mamma, the breast: see mamma[2].] I. n. An animal of the class Mammalia.—Aërial mammals, the bats.—Age of mammals, the Tertiary period in geology.

II. a. Having breasts or teats; mammiferous.

Mammalia (ma-mā′liạ), n. pl. [NL. (sc. animalia), neut. pl. of LL. mammalis (neut. sing. as a noun, mammale), of the breast: see mammal.] In zoöl., the highest class of Vertebrata, containing all those animals which suckle their young, and no others; mammiferous animals; the mammals. With the exception of the lowest subclass, the monotremes or Ornithodelphia, which lay eggs like birds, Mammalia are viviparous, bringing forth their young alive; and, with the same exception, the mammary gland is provided with a nipple for the young to suck. They have no gills, but breathe air by means of lungs, which are primitively an offset of the alimentary canal. The blood is warm; the heart is completely four-chambered or quadrilocular, with two auricles and two ventricles; and its right and left sides are entirely separate after birth, when the arterial and venous circulation and the pulmonary and systemic vessels become differentiated. The heart and lungs are situated in the thoracic cavity, which is completely shut off from the abdomen by a muscular diaphragm. The aorta is single and sinistral, curving over the left bronchus. The blood contains red circular non-nucleated blood-disks and white blood-corpuscles. The brain has large cerebral hemispheres, which are more or less extensively united by commissures, especially by a corpus callosum, which when well developed roofs over more or less of the lateral ventricles. The skull has two occipital condyles and an ossified basioccipital. The lower jaw, composed of a pair of simple mandibular rami, is directly articulated by a convex condyle with the glenoid fossa of the squamosal. The malleus and incus become specialized auditory ossicles, lodged like the stapes in the cavity of the tympanum. (See Malleifera.) Limbs are always present. There are ordinarily two pairs, anterior and posterior, or pectoral and pelvic, but the latter are sometimes aborted, as in cetaceans and sirenians. The ankle-joint, if there is one, is always formed between crural and tarsal bones, and is never mediotarsal. The body is usually more or less hairy, sometimes naked, rarely scaly or with a bony exoskeleton. The class Mammalia is definitely circumscribed, no transitional forms being known. It has been subdivided in various ways. Linnæus had 7 orders, Primates, Bruta, Ferœ, Glires, Pecora, Bellucæ, and Cete, with 40 genera in all. Cuvier made the 9 orders Bimana, Quadrumana, Carnaria, Marsupiata, Rodentia, Edentata, Pachydermata, Ruminantia, and Cetacea. Owen divided Mammalia primarily into 4 subclasses, according to the character of the brain, and 14 orders, as follows: Archencephala—Bimana; Gyrencephala—Quadrumana, Carnivora, Artiodactyla, Perissodactyla, Proboscidia, Sirenia, Cetacea; Lissencephala—Bruta, Chiroptera, Insectivora, Rodentia; Lyencephala—Marsupialia, Monotremata. Dana's prime divisions correspond to Owen's by other names, Archontia, Megasthena, Microsthena, and Orthoticoidea. In 1872 Gill arranged mammals in 3 subclasses and 14 orders, as follows: subclass Monodelphia, containing all placental mammals, orders Primates, Ferœ, Ungulata, Toxodontia (fossil), Hyracoidea, Proboscidea, Sirenia, Cete, in one series Educabilia, and Chiroptera, Insectivora, Glires, Bruta, in a second series Ineducabilia; subclass Didelphia, the implacental mammals, order Marsupialia alone; subclass Ornithodelphia, the oviparous mammals, order Monotremata alone. This is substantially the classification now almost universally current, but it is exclusive of certain fossil groups which require ordinal rank. The families of mammals now recognized are about 150 in number, the genera nearly 1,200; the living species are about 4,500. Remains of mammals abound in all Tertiary deposits, and a few forms have been found in Mesozoic beds. Also called Mammifera and Malleifera.

mammalian (ma-mā′liạn), a. and n. [< mammal + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Mammalia or mammals.

II. n. An animal of the class Mammalia; a mammal.

mammaliferous (mam-ạ-lif′e-rus), a. [< NL. mammale, a mammal, + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] In geol., bearing mammals; containing mammalian fossils, or the remains of Mammalia: as, mammaliferous strata.

mammalogical (mam-ạ-loj′i-kal), a. [< mammalog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to mammalogy. Owen, Class. Mammalia, p. 34.

mammalogist (ma-mal′ọ-jist), n. [< mammalog-y + -ist.] A student of the Mammalia; one who is versed in the science of mammalogy; a therologist. Also mastologist.

mammalogy (ma-mal′ọ-ji), n. [= Sp. mamalogía, < NL. mammale, a mammal, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The scientific knowledge of mammals; the science of the Mammalia; therology.

mammary (mam′ạ-ri), a. [= F. mammaire = Sp. Pg. mamario, < NL. mammarius, < L. mamma, the breast: see mamma[2].] Of or pertaining to a mamma or breast: as, a mammary artery, vein, nerve, duct, etc.; a mammary structure.—Mammary fetus, gestation, gland. See the nouns.

mammate (mam′āt), a. [< L. mammatus, having breasts, < mamma, breast: see mamma[2].] Having mammæ or breasts.

mammato-cumulus (ma-mā″tō-kū′mū-lus), n. A name given by Ley to a cumulus cloud when it has a festooned appearance: called pocky cloud in Orkney, where it is usually followed by wind.

Mammea (ma-mē′ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < Haytian mamey (> Sp. mamey).] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous trees of the family Clusiaceæ and tribe Calophylleæ, characterized by a calyx which is closed before the flower expands, and then becomes valvately 2-parted, and by a 2- to 4-celled ovary containing four ovules, usually with a peltate stigma. They are trees with rigid coriaceous leaves, often covered with pellucid dots; axillary flowers, either solitary or in clusters; and fruits which are indehiscent drupes with from one to four large seeds. There are 2 species, natives of tropical America and Africa. M. Americana is a tall tree with a thick spreading head, somewhat resembling Magnolia fœtida, and showy white sweet-scented flowers. The fruit, known as the mammee-apple or South American apricot, is much esteemed in tropical countries, and is eaten alone, or cut in slices with wine or sugar, or preserved in various ways. It is yellow, and as large as a cocoanut or small melon; the rind and the pulp about the seeds are very bitter, but the intermediate portion is sweet and aromatic. From the flowers a spirituous liquor is distilled. (See eau Créole, under eau.) The seeds, which are large, are used as anthelmintics, and a gum distilled from the bark is used to destroy chigoes. The tree is a native of the West Indies and tropical America, but is often cultivated in the tropics of the Old World.

mammeated (mam′ē-ā-ted), a. [< L. mammeatus (Plautus), an erroneous form for mammatus, having breasts: see mammate.] Having mammæ or breasts. [Rare.]

mammee (ma-mē′), n. The Mammea Americana, or its fruit.—African mammee, another tree or fruit, probably of the genus Garcinia.

mammee-apple (ma-mē′ap l), n. The tropical tree Mammea Americana, or its fruit.

mammee-sapota (ma-mē′sa-pō″tạ), n. Same as marmalade-tree.

mammellière (mam-e-lyãr′), n. [F., < mamelle, the breast: see mamma[2].] 1. A piece of armor, usually a circular or nearly circular plate, attached to the hauberk or broigne, or worn outside the surcoat, one covering each breast, and serving especially for the attachment of the end of the chain which was secured to the sword-hilt, mace, war-hammer, etc.—2. The pectoral, especially when serving to retain the ends of the chains securing the sword-hilt, dagger-hilt, or the like, and differing from the piece of armor above defined in being one plate only instead of one of two side by side mammer† (mam′ėr), v. i. [< ME. mamelen, momelen, < AS. mamorian, mamrian, be in deep thought, < mamor, deep sleep, unconsciousness; connections unknown.] To hesitate; stammer from doubt or hesitation.

> I wonder in my soul
> What you would ask me that I should deny,
> Or stand so mammering on. Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 70.

> He forsook God, gave ear to the serpent's counsel, began to mammer of the truth, and to frame himself outwardly to do that which his conscience reproved inwardly.
> J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 106.

mammering† (mam′ėr-ing), n. [Formerly also mammoring; verbal n. of mammer, v.] A state of hesitation or doubt; quandary; perplexity.

> There were only v. C. horsemen which assembled themselves together, and stood in a mammoring whether it were better to resist or to fire.
> J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, v.

> But is not this Thais which I see? It's even she. I am in a mammering: ah, what should I do!
> Terence in English (1614). (Nares.)

mammery†, n. [In the passage cited spelled irreg. mamorie; a var. of mammering, as if < mammer + -y.] Same as mammering.

> My quill remained (as men say) in a mamorie, quivering in my quaking fingers, before I durst presume to publishe these my fantasies.
> Sir H. Wotton, Cupid's Cautels, etc. (1578), To the Reader.

mammet†, mammetrous†, etc. See maumet, etc.

mammichug, n. Same as mummychog.

mammie (mam′i), n. See mammy.

mammifer (mam′i-fėr), n. [< NL. mammifer, < L. mamma, breast, + ferre = E. bear[1].] An animal having mammæ; a member of the Mammifera; a mammal.

Mammifera (ma-mif′e-rạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of mammifer: see mammiferous.] Mammiferous animals as a class: same as Mammalia. De Blainville.

mammiferous (ma-mif′e-rus), a. [< NL. mammifer, < L. mamma, breast, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Having mammæ; being a mammifer; of or pertaining to the Mammifera; mammalian.

mammiform (mam′i-fôrm), a. [< L. mamma, breast, + forma, shape.] Like a breast or teat; mastoid; mammillary.

mammiformed (mam′i-fôrmd), a. Same as mammiform. E. Roberts, in Jour. Brit. Archæol. Ass., XXX. 91.

mammilla (ma-mil′ạ), n.; pl. mammillæ (-ē). [L. mamilla, less prop. mammilla, breast, nipple, dim. of mamma, breast: see mamma[2].] 1. The nipple of the mammary gland. Hence—2. Some nipple-like or mammillary structure.

> The crystals of others [stones] assume a mammillated form, the mamillæ being covered with minute crystals.
> Geol. Jour., XLV. 322.

3. In entom., a small conical process or appendage on a surface; a mammula.—4. [cap.] In conch., a genus of gastropods. Schumacher, 1817.—5. In bot., applied specifically (a) to tubercles on a plant-surface, as in Coryphantha; (b) to the apex of the nucellus of an ovule; (c) to granular prominences on some pollen-grains.

mammillar (mam′i-lạr), a. Same as mammillary.

mammillary (mam′i-lā-ri), a. [= F. mamillaire, < LL. mamillaris* (in neut mamillare, a breast-cloth), < L. mamilla, mammilla, breast, nipple: see mammilla.] 1. Pertaining to a mamma, pap, dug, or teat.—2. Resembling a nipple.—3. Studded with mammiform protuberances; having rounded projections, as a mineral composed of convex concretions in form somewhat resembling breasts.

Mammillary Structure.—Malachite.

> West of this place, in Milam and Williamson counties, the nearly level prairies are mammillary, with slight elevations eight or ten feet apart, presenting the appearance of old tobacco or potato hills on a gigantic scale.
> Science, III. 404.

Mammillary bodies, the corpora albicantia of the brain. See corpus.—Mammillary brooch, a kind of brooch found among Celtic remains. It consists of two saucer-shaped or cup-shaped pieces connected by a third piece or handle.—Mammillary process, the mastoid process of the temporal bone.—Mammillary tubercle, the rudimentary metapophysis of a lumbar vertebra in man.

mammillate (mam′i-lāt), a. [< NL. mammillatus, < L. mamilla, mammilla, breast, nipple: see mammilla.] 1. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) Having a mammilla or mammillæ; provided with mammillary processes: specifically applied, (1) in entom., to the palp of an insect the last joint of which is smaller than the preceding and retracted within it; (2) in conch., to a shell whose apex is teat-like. (b) Mammillary in form; shaped like a nipple.—2. In bot., bearing little nipple-shaped prominences on the surface.

mammillated (mam′i-lā-ted), a. 1. Having nipple-like processes or protuberances; furnished with anything resembling a nipple or nipples: as, a mammillated mineral (as flint containing chalcedony); a mammillated shell (one whose apex is rounded like a teat).—2. Nipple-shaped; formed like a teat.

> Both the mound and mammillated projections stand about three feet higher than any other part of the reef.
> Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 14.

mammillation (mam-i-lā′shọn), n. [< NL. mammillatio(n-), < L. mamilla, mammilla, a nipple.] 1. The state of being mammillated, in any sense.—2. In bot., the state or condition of being covered with mammillary protuberances.—3. In pathol., a mammilliform protuberance.

mammilliform (ma-mil′i-fôrm), a. [< L. mamilla, mammilla, nipple, + forma, form.] Mammillary in form; nipple-like; mammilloid; papilliform.

> The teeth upon the surface are quite mammilliform.
> Geol. Jour., XLIV. 147.

mammilloid (mam′i-loid), a. [< L. mamilla, mammilla, nipple, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Shaped like a nipple; mammillary in form; resembling a mammilla. Owen.

mammitis (ma-mī'tis), n. [< L. mamma, the breast, + -itis.] Inflammation of a mamma. Also called mastitis.

mammock (mam'ọk), n. [Origin obscure; the term. -ock is dim., as in hillock, hummock.] A shapeless piece; a chunk; a fragment. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

But while Protestants, to avoid the due labor of understanding their own Religion, are content to lodg it in the Breast or rather in the Books of a Clergyman, and to take it thence by scraps and mammocks, as he dispenses it in his Sundays Dole, they will always be learning and never knowing. Milton, Touching Hirelings.

mammock (mam'ọk), v. t. [Also mommock, mommick; < mammock, n.] To tear in pieces; maul; mangle; mumble.

He did so set his teeth and tear it; O, I warrant, how he mammocked it! Shak., Cor., i. 3. 71.

The obscene and surfeted Priest scruples not to paw and mammock the sacramentall bread as familiarly as his Tavern Bisket. Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

mammodis (mam'ọ̄-dis), n. pl. [< Hind. mahmūdī, a kind of fine muslin.] Cotton cloths from India: usually applied to the plain ones only. Also mahmoodis, mahmoudis, mahmudis.

Mammon (mam'ọn), n. [In ME. Mammona; = F. Mammon = G. Mammon = Goth. Mammona = Russ. Mamona, < LL. Mammon, Mammonas, Mammōna, Mamona, < Gr. Μαμμωνᾶς, usually Μαμωνᾶς, < Syr. (Chaldee) māmōnā, riches. Cf. Heb. matmōn, a hidden treasure, < tāman, hide.] 1. A Syriac word used once in the New Testament as a personification of riches and worldliness, or the god of this world; hence, the spirit or deity of avarice; cupidity personified. [A proper name in this sense, although printed without a capital in the English Bible (see second quotation).]

And of Mammonaes moneye mad hym meny frendes.
Piers Plowman (C), xi. 87.

No man can serve two masters. . . . Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Mat. vi. 24.

Mammon, the least erected spirit that fell
From heaven; for ev'n in heaven his looks and thoughts
Were always downward bent; admiring more
The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold,
Than aught divine or holy. Milton, P. L., i. 679.

2. [l. c.] Material wealth; worldly possessions.

Mammon is riches or aboundance of goods.
Tyndale, Works, p. 233.

If therefore ye have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon, who will commit to your trust the true riches? Luke xvi. 11.

mammonish (mam'ọn-ish), a. [< Mammon + -ish[1].] Devoted to the service of Mammon or the pursuit of riches; actuated by a spirit of mammonism or of money-getting.

A great, black, devouring world, not Christian, but Mammonish, Devilish. Carlyle.

mammonism (mam'ọn-izm), n. [< Mammon + -ism.] Devotion to the pursuit of material wealth; the spirit of worldliness; the service of Mammon.

Alas! if Hero-worship become Dilettantism, and all except Mammonism be a vain grimace, how much in this most earnest Earth has gone, and is evermore going, to fatal destruction! Carlyle, Past and Present, ii. 16. (Davies.) mammonist (mam'ọn-ist), n. [< Mammon + -ist.] One who is devoted to the acquisition of material wealth; one whose heart is set on riches above all else; a worldling.

The great mammonists' would say, he is rich that can maintain an army. Ep. Hall, The Righteous Mammon.

mammonistic (mam-ọ-nis'tik), a. [< Mammonist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mammonism.

The common mammonistic feeling of the enormous importance of money.
Geo. MacDonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, lx.

mammonite (mam'ọn-īt), n. [< Mammon + -ite[2].] [cap. or l. c.] A devotee of Mammon; a mammonist.

When a Mammonite mother kills her babe for a burial fee,
And Timour-Mammon grins on a pile of children's bones,
Is it peace or war? better war! Tennyson, Maud, i. 12.

If he will desert his own class, if he will try to become a sham gentleman, a parasite, and, if he can, a Mammonite, the world will compliment him on his noble desire to "rise in life." Kingsley, Alton Locke, v.

mammonization (mam″ọn-i-zā'shọn), n. [< mammonize + -ation.] The act or process of rendering mammonish or devoted to the pursuit of material wealth; the state of being under the influence or actuated by the spirit of mammonism.

mammonize (mam'ọn-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mammonized, ppr. mammonizing. [< Mammon + -ize.] To render mammonish or devoted to the pursuit of material wealth; actuate by a spirit of mammonism.

mammose (mam'ōs), a. [< L. mammosus, full-breasted, < mamma, breast: see mamma[2].] Same as mammiform. [Rare.]

mammoth (mam'ọth), n. and a. [Formerly mammon, etc.; < Russ. mammot (now mamant), > F. mammouth, G. mammuth: named by a German named Ludolf in 1696: said to be < Tatar mamma (not found), the earth, "because, the remains of these animals being found embedded in the earth, the natives believed that they burrowed like moles" (Imp. Dict.).] I. n. An extinct species of elephant, Elephas primigenius. It is nearly related to the existing Indian elephant, having teeth of similar pattern, and is believed to have been the ancestor of this species; but it was thickly covered with a shaggy coat of three kinds, long stiff bristles and long flexible hairs being mixed with a kind of wool. This warm covering enabled it to endure the rigor of winter in its native regions. The tusks were of great size and much curved. An entire mammoth was discovered in 1799 by a Tungusian fisherman named Schumachoff, embedded in the ice on the banks of the river Lena in Siberia, in such complete preservation that its flesh was eaten by dogs, wolves, and bears. It was about 9 feet high and 16 feet long, with tusks 9 feet long measured along the curve. In 1902 another carcass was found in frozen ground on the bank of the Beresovska. This carcass showed that the ears were small like those of the Asiatic elephant and the legs slender as in the African elephant. The bones and tusks of the mammoth have been found abundantly in Siberia, and the fossil ivory has been of great commercial value. This article had been known for many centuries before the discovery of the animal itself, and the mammoth is now supposed to have ranged, before, during, and after the glacial epoch, over the greater part of the northern hemisphere. That it was contemporary with prehistoric man is shown by the discovery of a drawing of the animal scratched on a piece of its own ivory found in a cave in France. This species is more expressly known as the hairy mammoth. The name mammoth is extended to other fossil elephants of the same genus or of the subfamily Elephantinæ, but is not applicable to the mastodons, of the subfamily Mastodontinæ.

II. a. Of great comparative size, like a mammoth; gigantic; colossal; immense: as, a mammoth ox; a mammoth race; the mammoth tree of California.—Mammoth tree, Washingtonia gigantea, of California, the largest of coniferous trees. See big tree, under big.

mammothrept† (mam'ọ̄-thrept), n. [< LL. mammothreptus, < Gr. μαμμόθρεπτος, brought up by one's grandmother, < μάμμα, a grandmother (see mama), + θρεπτός, verbal adj. of τρέφειν, nourish, bring up.] A child brought up by its grandmother; hence, a spoiled child; a delicate nursling. [Rare.]

And for we are the Mammothrepts of Sinne, Crosse vs with Christ to weane our joys therein.
Davies, Holy Roode, p. 15. (Davies.)

O, you are a mere mammothrept in judgment.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

mammula (mam'ụ̄-lạ̄), n.; pl. mammulæ (-lē). [NL., < L. mammula, dim. of mamma, the breast: see mamma.] In zoöl., a small conical or cylindrical process; specifically, one of the processes or appendages forming the spinneret of a spider. Each of these is pierced with a great number of minute orifices, from which the viscid fluid forming the silk is emitted.

★ mammy (mam'i), n.; pl. mammies (-iz). [Also mammie; a childish dim. of mama.] 1. Mother; mama: a childish word.

An' aye she wrought her mammie's wark,
An' aye she sang sae merrilie.
Burns, There was a Lass.

Hence—2. In the southern United States, especially during the existence of slavery, a colored female nurse; a colored woman having the care of white children, who often continue to call her mammy after they are grown up.

mammychug, n. See mummychog.

mamoodi (mä-mō'dē), n. [< Ar. mahmūdī, < mahmūd, praised: see Mohammedan.] A silver coin weighing 36 grains, formerly current in Persia; also, a Persian money of account.

mamoul (ma-mōl'), n. [Ar. Hind. ma'mūl, practised, established.] Custom; precedent; established usage; the common law most respected by all Orientals.

To him [a Hindu] all this outcry is but mamoul—usage, custom—and mamoul is to him as air.
J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 284.

mampalon (mam'pa-lon), n. [Native name (?).] An aquatic otter-like viverrine quadruped, Cynogale bennetti of Borneo, with webbed plantigrade feet, short stout cylindric tail, and broad tumid muzzle with long stiff whiskers. The animal is about 18 inches long, and represents in the family Viverridæ the same modification in adaptation to aquatic life that the otter shows in the family Mustelidæ. Also written mampelon.

mamuquet, n. [< OF. mammuque (Cotgrave); prob. for manuque* = It. manuche (Florio); of E. Ind. origin, and prob. connected with manucodiata, bird of Paradise: see manucodiata.] A fabulous Eastern bird, supposed to be an exaggeration of the bird of Paradise.

Mammuque [F.], a wingless bird, of an unknown beginning, and after death not corrupting; she hath feet a hand long, and so light a body, so long feathers, that she is continually carried in the air, whereon she feeds; some call her the bird of Paradice, but erroneously; for that hath wings, and differs in other parts from this. Cotgrave.

But note we now, towards the rich Moluques,
Those passing strange and wondrous (birds) Mamuques.
None knowes their nest, none knowes the dam that breeds them. Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 5.

★ man (man), n.; pl. men (men). [Also dial. mon; < ME. man, mon, pl. men, < AS. man, mon, mann, monn (pl. men, menn), also rarely manna, monna (pl. mannan, monnan) = OS. man = OFries. man, mon = D. man = MLG. man, LG. mann = OHG. MHG. man, G. mann = Icel. madhr, also rarely manni (in comp. mann-; nom. orig. manr*) = Sw. man = Dan. mand = Goth. manna (mannan-, mann-, man-), a man (L. vir), a human being, a person (L. homo), in the latter use becoming in AS. man, mon, ME. man, men, me = D. men = OHG. MHG. G. man = Sw. Dan. man = Goth. manna, merely pronominal, 'one (cf. F. on, 'one,' < L. homo, a man), esp. with a negative (Goth. ni manna = G. niemand, no one; G. jemand, any one); Teut. stem in three forms, mann-, mannan-, and man-, as shown in Goth. and Icel. (the third form man- existing in Goth. gen. sing. and nom. and acc. pl. mans, and prob. also in Icel. man, neut., a bondman, bondwoman, girl); the earlier mann- being for manw-, manu- (cf. chin, < AS. cin, cinn* = Goth. kinnus = Gr. γένυς; min[2], ult. < minu-* = Gr. μινύς) = Skt. manu, man (Manu, the mythical father of the human race (cf. OTeut. in L. form Mannus, mentioned by Tacitus as a deity of the ancient Germans)), with deriv. mānusha, man. Cf. OBulg. mažzhĭ (orig. monzhĭ*) = Bulg. mŭzh = Sloven. mòzh = Serv. Bohem. muzh = Pol. mazh = Little Russ. muzh = Russ. muzhŭ, a man, husband (> Russ. muzhikŭ, a peasant). Not found in Gr., nor in L., unless it be = L. mas (mar-), a male (if that stands for orig. mans*), > ult. E. male[1], masculine, marital, marry[1], etc.: see these words. The ult. origin of the Teut. and Skt. word is unknown. It is usually explained as lit. 'the thinker,' < √ man, think (> ult. E. mind[1], mean[1], L. men(t-)s, mind, > E. mental, etc.); but that primitive men should think of themselves as 'thinkers' is quite incredible: that is a comparatively modern conception. Another derivation, referring to L. manere, remain, dwell, is also improbable. It is not likely that any orig. significant term old enough to have become a general designation for 'man' before the Aryan dispersion would have retained its orig. significance. The E. man retains the senses of L. vir and homo; in D. G. Dan. the word cognate with E. man means vir, while a derivative, D. G. mensch, Dan. menneske, etc., means homo: see mensk, mannish. The irreg. pl. of man is due to original i- umlaut, the AS. pl. men, menn, being orig. manni*, changed to menni* by umlaut, and then abbr. to menn, men by loss of the final vowel, the radical vowel, thus accidentally changed in the plural, coming to be significant of number. A similar change appears in feet, geese, mice, etc., pl. of foot, goose, mouse, etc.] 1. In zoöl., a featherless plantigrade biped mammal of the genus Homo (which see); H. sapiens, a species of the family Hominidæ or Anthropidæ, order Primates, class Mammalia, of which there are several geographical races or varieties. Blumenbach divided mankind into five varieties: (1) Caucasian, having a white skin; (2) Mongolian, having an olive skin; (3) Ethiopian, having a black skin and black eyes; (4) American, having a dark skin more or less of a red tint; (5) Malay, having a brown or tawny skin. A more recent and commonly accepted classification divides man into three races, Ethiopian, Mongolian, and Caucasian, characterized respectively by woolly, straight, and wavy hair.

2†. A being, whether super- or infra-natural; a person.

For God is holde a ryghtwys man.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 86).

Well said, i' faith, neighbour Verges: well, God's a good man; an two men ride of a horse, one must ride behind.
Shak., Much Ado, iii. 5. 40.

Exp. But was the devil a proper man, gossip?
Mirth. As fine a gentleman of his inches as ever I saw trusted to the stage, or anywhere else.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, i. 2.

Do all we can,
Death is a man
That never spareth none.
Quoted in Memoirs of P. P.

3. An individual of the human race; a human being; a person: as, all men are mortal.

For he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him. 1 Sam. xxv. 17.

If any man have ears to hear, let him hear. Mark iv. 23.

O jest unseen, inscrutable, invisible,
As a nose on a man's face.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 1. 142.

A man would expect to find some antiquities.
Addison, Remarks on Italy.

4. Generically, the human race; mankind; human beings collectively: used without article or plural: as, man is born to trouble; the rights of man.

But he deyde with-ynne v yere after he was wedded, and lefte a sone, the feirest creature of man that was formed.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 186.

Man being not only the noblest creature in the world, but even a very world in himself.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 9.

All these his wondrous works, but chiefly man,
His chief delight and favour. Milton, P. L., iii. 663.

Specifically—5. A male adult of the human race, as distinguished from a woman or a boy; one who has attained manhood, or who is regarded as of manly estate.

Ther-with departed the kynge Ventres and his company, that was a moche man of body, and a gode knyght and yonge, of prime barbe. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 117.

Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man. 1 Cor. xi. 9.

All the men present signed a paper, desiring that a picture should be painted and a print taken from it of her Royal Highness. Greville, Memoirs, Sept. 3, 1818.

At Cambridge and eke at Oxford, every stripling is accounted a Man from the moment of his putting on the gown and cap.
Gradus ad Cantab., p. 75, quoted in College Words.

6. In an emphatic sense, an adult male possessing manly qualities in an eminent degree; one who has the gifts or virtues of true manhood.

Grace & good maners makythe a man.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 70.

I dare do all that may become a man;
Who dares do more is none.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 46.

A combination and a form, indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 62.

Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow!
The rest is all but leather or prunella.
Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 203.

7. The qualities which characterize true manhood; manliness.

Methought he bare himself in such a fashion,
So full of man, and sweetness in his carriage.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, ii. 1.

8. An adult male considered as in some sense appertaining to or under the control of another person; a vassal, follower, servant, attendant, or employee; one immediately subject to the will of another: as, the officers and men of an army; a gentleman's man (a valet or body-servant); I am no man's man.

Like master, like man. Old proverb.

I'll come and call you home to dinner, and my man shall attend you. Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 264.

Yet any one who talks to German officers on the subject of their men learns from them that they do not by any means consider the average German as the best material of which to make a soldier.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 23.

9. A husband: as, my man is not at home (said by a wife). [Now only provincial or vulgar, except in the phrase man and wife.]

Forasmuch as M. and N. have consented together in holy wedlock, . . . I pronounce that they are Man and Wife.
Book of Common Prayer, Solemnization of Matrimony.

In the next place, every wife ought to answer for her man. Addison, The Ladies' Association.

10. One subject to a mistress; a lover or suitor. [Now vulgar.]

I wol nat ben untrewe for no wight,
But as hire man I wol ay lyve and sterve,
And nevere noon other creature serve.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 447.

11. A word of familiar address, often implying some degree of disparagement or impatience.

We speak no treason, man. Shak., Rich. III., i. 1. 90.

"You will think me—I don't know what you will think me——." "Get it out, man. I can't tell till I know."
Mrs. Oliphant, Poor Gentleman, xlv.

12. A piece with which a game, as chess or checkers, is played.—13. Naut., in compounds, a ship or other vessel: as, man-of-war; merchant*man*, India*man*, etc.—A man of death†. See death.—Banbury man†, a Puritan; a sour or severe man. Banbury was at one time a center of Puritanism. [Eng.]—Best man, a friend who acts as a ceremonial attendant to a bridegroom at a wedding; a groomsman: formerly applied also to one who served a bride in that capacity.

The swans they bound the bride's best man,
Below a green aik tree.
The Earl of Mar's Daughter (Child's Ballads, I. 177).

Bible man. See Lollard[1], 2.—Dead man. (a) A supernumerary.

At the Dog Tavern, Captain Philip Holland, with whom I advised how to make some advantage of my Lord's going to sea, told me to have five or six servants entered on board as dead men, and I to give them what wages I pleased, and so their pay to be mine. Pepys, Diary, I. 34.

(b) pl. See dead.—Dead man's part. Same as dead's part.—Happy man be his dole†. See dole[1].—Iron man. (a) In glass-making, an apparatus sometimes used to facilitate the blowing of large cylinders for sheet-glass. It consists of a rail projecting from the front of the blowing-furnace and carrying a pair of wheels upon which the cylinder and the blowing-iron or blow-tube of the operator are supported during the process of blowing. By means of the wheels, the cylinder can easily be moved away from or toward the furnace. (b) In some parts of England, a coal-cutting machine.—Man about town, a man of the leisure class who frequent clubs, theaters, hotels, and other places of public or social resort; a fashionable idler.

The fame of his fashion as a man about town was established throughout the county. Thackeray, Pendennis, ii.

I had known him as an idler and a man about town, but he was now transformed into an energetic and capable member of the government. The Century, XXXVII. 212.

Man alive! a familiar ejaculation expressive of surprise or remonstrance.—Man Friday, a servile or devoted follower; a factotum: from the man found by Robinson Crusoe on his deserted island, whom he always calls "my man Friday."—Man in the iron mask. See mask[3].—Man in the moon, a fancied semblance of a man walking with a dog, and with a bush near him (also, sometimes, of a human face), seen in the disk of the full moon.

The lanthorn is the moon; I, the man in the moon; this thorn-bush, my thorn-bush; and this dog, my dog.
Shak., M. N. D., v. 1. 262.

Man in the oak, a sprite or goblin.

The man in the oke, the hell-waine, the fier-drake, the puckle, Tom Thombe, hobgoblins, Tom Tumbler, boneless, and such other bugs, that we were afraid of our own shadowes. R. Scot, Discoverie of Witchcraft. (Davies.)

The haunt of . . . witches [and] the man in the oak.
S. Judd, Margaret, i. 5.

Man of arms†. (a) A soldier. (b) A man-at-arms.

Manacus (man′a-kus), n. [NL., < D. (MD.) manneken (given by Brisson as manaken), applied to this bird: see manikin.] 1. A genus of South American birds of the family Pipridæ and subfamily Piprinæ, established by Brisson in 1760 upon the black-capped manikin of Edwards, Common Manikin (Manacus manacus).

called Pipra manacus by Linnæus in 1766; the manikins proper. The genus has been used with great latitude, but is now restricted to species like the one named, which have feathers of the throat long and fully puffed out like a beard, and some of the primaries attenuated and falcate. There are several such. See manikin.

2. [l. c.] In ornith., a bird of the genus Manacus in a broad sense: originally applied to Pipra manacus, called the bearded manikin from the beard-like tuft of feathers on the chin, and hence extended to birds of the subfamily Piprinæ, or even of the whole family Pipridæ. They are mesomyodian passerine birds, generally of middle size and brilliant coloration, confined to the wooded parts of tropical America. The species are numerous, and belong to many different modern genera. See Pipridæ.

manage† (man′āj), n. [Early mod. E. also menage; < OF. manege, F. manège, the handling or training of a horse, horsemanship, riding, manœuvers, proceedings (ML. managium), = Sp. Pg. manejo, handling, management, < It. maneggio, the handling or training of a horse, < maneggiare (= F. manier), handle, touch, treat, manage, < mano, < L. manus, the hand: see main[3], manual. The word has been partly confused, through the obs. var. menage[2], with menage[1], household, household management: see menage[1].] 1. The handling, control, or training of a horse; manège.

He sits me fast, however I do stir,
And now hath made me to his hand so right
That in the menage myself takes delight.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 527).

His horses are bred better; for besides that they are fair with their feeding, they are taught their manage, and to that end riders dearly hired.
Shak., As you Like it, i. 1. 13.

2. A ring for the training of horses and the practice of horsemanship; a riding-school.

Macaulay, William Pitt.

Mothers, wives, and maids,
These be the tools wherewith priests manage men.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 166.

5. To arrange, fashion, contrive, effect, or carry out by skill or art; carry on or along; bring about: as, to manage the characters of a play, or the plot of a novel; to manage a delicate or perplexing piece of business.

I have a jest to execute, that I cannot manage alone.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2. 181.

She expected to coax me at once: she'll not manage that in one effort. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xxxiv.

6. To succeed in contriving; effect by effort, or by action of any kind (in the latter case often ironical): with an infinitive for object: as, to manage to hold one's own; in his eagerness he managed to lose everything.

The boy was nearly washed overboard, but he managed to catch hold of the rail, and . . . stuck his knees into the bulwarks. Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. i.

=Syn. 3. Manage, Conduct, Direct, handle, superintend, supervise, order, transact. Manage literally implies handling, and hence primarily belongs to smaller concerns, on which one may at all times keep his hand: as, to manage a house; to manage a theater. Its essential idea is that of constant attention to details: as, only a combination of great abilities with a genius for industry can manage the affairs of an empire. To conduct is to lead along, hence to attend with personal supervision; it implies the determination of the main features of administration and the securing of thoroughness in those who carry out the commands; it is used of both large things and small, but generally refers to a definite task, coming to an end or issue: as, to conduct a religious service, a funeral, a campaign. Direct allows the person directing to be at a distance or near; the word suggests more authority than manage or conduct. See govern and guide, v. t.

The common remark that public business is worse managed than all other business is not altogether unfounded.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 317.

When a general undertakes to conduct a campaign, he will intrust the management of minor concerns to persons on whom he can rely; but he will direct in person whatever is likely to have any serious influence on his success.
Crabb, Synonymes, p. 241.

Lord marshal, command our officers at arms,
Be ready to direct these home-alarms.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 1. 205.

II. intrans. To direct or conduct affairs; regulate or carry on any business.

Leave them to manage for thee, and to grant
What their unerring wisdom sees thee want.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, x. 536.

"Mamma managed badly" was her way of summing up what she had seen of her mother's experience [in matrimony]: she herself would manage quite differently.
George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxvi.

manatee (man-a-tē′), n. [Also manati, manatin, manatie, etc.; = F. manate, manat (and lamantin), NL. manatus; < Sp. manatí, of Taino (W. Ind.) manati, < Carib manattui, said to mean 'big beaver.'] A sea-cow; a gregarious herbivorous aquatic sirenian mammal, of the genus Trichechus, family Trichechidæ, and order Sirenia. The American manatee, to which the name was originally given, and to which it specially pertains, is Trichechus manatus or americanus. The manatee inhabits the shallow waters of rivers and estuaries on the eastern coast of tropical and subtropical America, from Florida and some of the West India islands to about lat. 20° S. It is a sluggish, timid, and inoffensive animal, found in small herds, feeding on aquatic vegetation, and attaining sometimes a length of 8 or 10 feet. In general aspect the manatee resembles a small whale or other cetacean, but it belongs to a different order, though it was formerly considered a herbivorous cetacean. The body is naked and stout, shaped like that of a fish, without trace of hind limbs, ending in an expansive shovel- or spoon-shaped tail; the fore limbs are flippers or paddles without outward distinction of digits, but with flattened nails; the eyes and ears are small; and the whole physiognomy is peculiar, owing to the tumidity and great mobility of the muzzle. There is an entirely distinct species, Manatus senegalensis, found on the western coast of Africa, to which the name extends.

Manatidæ (mā-nat′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Manatus + -idæ.] A family of sirenians, typified by the genus Manatus. Formerly coextensive with the order Sirenia, it is now restricted, by the exclusion of Halicore, Rhytina, Halitherium, and other genera, to forms having the tail entire and rounded, the last five or more vertebræ cylindrical and devoid of transverse processes, and the premaxillary bones short and straight; the sea-cows. Correctly called Trichechidæ, a name erroneously applied to walruses. See manatee, Manatus, and Sirenia. Also Manatida, Manatina.

manatine (man′a-tin), a. [< Manatus + -ine[1].] Resembling or related to a manatee; of or pertaining to the Manatidæ; manatoid.

manation† (mā-nā′shon), n. [= Pg. manação, < L. manatio(n-), < manare, flow, run, trickle. Hence ult. emanate.] The act of issuing or flowing out; flux; flow. [Rare.]

2. In her., the representation of a sleeve used as a bearing. The sleeve so represented is generally the fourteenth century sleeve with a long hanging end. Also émanche, mancheron.

A rowle of parchment Clunn about him beares, Charged with the armes of all his ancestors; . . .
This manch, that moone, this martlet, and that mound.
Herrick, Upon Clunn.

3. The neck of a violin, guitar, or similar instrument.

Manchester brown. See brown.

manchet (man′chet), n. and a. [Also mainchet; origin obscure. Cf. cheat-bread.] I. n. 1. A small loaf or roll of the finest white bread; bread made from the finest and whitest wheaten flour. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Little pretty thin manchets that shine through, and seem more like to be made of paper, or fine parchment, than of wheat flour.
Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 179.

Of bread made of wheat we have sundrie sorts dailie brought to the table, whereof the first and most excellent is the mainchet, which we commonlie call white bread.
Holinshed, Descrip. of Eng., ii. 6.

Take cleere water for strong wine, browne breade for fine manchet. Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 118.

2. In her., the representation of a round cake, as of bread, resembling a muffin.

II. a. Used in making manchets (said of flour); also, made of the finest flour. [Obsolete or archaic.]

And Salamons fode was in one day thyrtie quarters of manchet floure, and thre score quarters of mele.
Bible of 1551, 3 Ki. [1 Ki.] iv. 22.

Gied them red wine and manchet cake,
And all for the Gipsy laddie O.
Johnnie Faa (Child's Ballads, IV. 284).

And Enid brought sweet cakes to make them cheer,
And, in her veil enfolded, manchet bread.
Tennyson, Geraint.

mânchette (F. pron. moṅ-shet′), n. [F.: dim. of manche, sleeve: see manche[2].] A word used in English at different periods for various ornamental styles of cuff.

man-child (man′chīld), n.; pl. men-children (men′chil″drėn). A male child.

Bring forth men-children only,
Nothing but males. Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 72.

manchineel (man-chi-nēl′), n. [< F. mancenille, manzanille = It. mancinello (NL. mancinella), < Sp. manzanillo, manchineel (cf. manzanilla, camomile), < manzana, an apple, prob. < L. Matiana, sc. mala, a kind of apples, neut. pl. of Matianus, pertaining to a Matius, < Matius, the name of a Roman gens.] A tree, Hippomane Mancinella, of moderate size, found in the West Indies, Central America, and Florida. It abounds in a white, milky, very caustic, poisonous sap, the virulence of which has been exaggerated. It appears to be especially deleterious to the eyes.—Bastard manchineel, a West Indian apocynaceous tree, Cameraria latifolia, somewhat resembling the manchineel.—Mountain manchineel, the poison-wood, Metopium Metopium.

Manchineel (Hippomane Mancinella).

manch-present†, n. See maunch-present.

Manchu[1], Manchoo (man-chö′), n. and a. [Also Manchow, Mantchoo (Chin. Manchu), < Manchu Manchu, lit. 'pure,' applied by the founder of the Manchu dynasty to his family or the people over whom he ruled.] I. n. 1. One of a race, belonging to the Tungusic branch of the Ural-Altaic family, from which Manchuria takes its name, and which conquered China in the seventeenth century.—2. The native language of Manchuria.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Manchus, their country (Manchuria), or their language.

manchu[2] (man-chö′), n. [Also manchua, < Pg. manchua; < Malayalam manchu.] An East Indian cargo-boat, ordinarily with a single mast and a square sail, much used on the Malabar coast.

Manchurian, Manchoorian (man-chö′ri-an), a. [< Manchuria (see def.) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Manchuria, a large territory which is a dependency of China and the original home of the Tatar dynasty ruling there 1644–1912. It lies east of Mongolia and north of Korea.—Manchurian deer. See deer.

mancipable (man′si-pa-bl), a. [< mancip(ate) + -able.] Capable of being alienated by formal sale and transfer. [Rare.]

The origin of the distinction between mancipable and non-mancipable things, and of the formal conveyance by mancipation applicable to the first, has been explained in connection with the reforms of Servius Tullius.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 689.

mancipate† (man′si-pāt), v. t. [< L. mancipatus, pp. of mancipare, mancupare (> It. mancipare, manceppare = Sp. mancipar), deliver up, as property, by means of the formal act of purchase (mancipium), transfer, alienate, < manceps (mancip-), a purchaser, < manus, hand, + capere, take: see captive. Cf. emancipate.] 1. To sell and make over to another.—2. To enslave; bind; restrict.

Only man was made capable of a spiritual sovereignty, and only man hath enthralled and mancipated himself to a spiritual slavery. Donne, Sermons, xix.

3. To emancipate: an erroneous use.

Such a dispensation [the Jewish] is a pupillage, and a slavery, which he [man] earnestly must desire to be redeemed and mancipated from. Barrow, Works, II. xv.

mancipate† (man′si-pāt), a. [< L. mancipatus: see mancipate, v.] Enslaved.

Though they were partly free, yet in some poynt remayned styll as thrall and mancipate to the subjection of the English men. Holinshed, vol. i., m 8, col. 1. (Nares.) mancipation (man-si-pā′shon), n. [= F. mancipation, < L. mancipatio(n-), a delivery, transfer of a thing to a person as property, < mancipare, deliver: see mancipate. Cf. emancipation.] 1. In Rom. antiq., a legal formality for acquiring title to property, whether by actual or by simulated purchase. This formality was employed not only in the case of property which could change hands by actual transfer, but also with relation to immaterial rights and privileges, as the prerogatives arising from marriage, adoption, emancipation from paternal authority, etc. The formality consisted in a declaration of purchase before five witnesses, followed by the weighing out, by an officer with brazen scales, of the real or figurative purchase-money. This form of sale was abolished by Justinian.

2†. The act of mancipating or enslaving; slavery; involuntary servitude.

They who fall away after they were once enlightened in baptism, . . . if it be into a contradictory state of sin and mancipation, . . . then "there remains nothing but a fearful expectation of judgment."
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 177.

mancipatory (man'si-pā-tō-ri), a. [< mancipate + -ory.] In Rom. antiq., pertaining to or consisting of mancipation or ceremonial sale.

It was this practice of every day life in private transactions that Servius adopted as the basis of his mancipatory conveyance. Encyc. Brit., XX. 676.

manciple (man'si-pl), n. [< ME. manciple, maunciple, < OF. mancipe, a steward, purveyor, < L. manceps (mancip-), a purchaser, renter, farmer, contractor, factor, etc.: see mancipate. The l is unoriginal, as in principle, participle.] A steward, a caterer or purveyor, particularly of an English college or inn of court.

A gentil mauncyple was ther of a temple,
Of which achatours mighten take exemple,
For to be wyse in byĳng of vitaille.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 567.

Not the meanest minister among the dishes but is hallowed to me through his imagination, and the Cook goes forth a Manciple. Lamb, Oxford in Vacation.

mancona bark (man-kō'nä bärk). See *bark*2.

mancus (mang'kus), n. [ÆS. mancus, also mances, mangcus (= OLG. mancus = OHG. mancusa, manchusa); of doubtful origin.] An Anglo-Saxon money of account employed in England from the ninth century onward. It was equivalent to 30 pence, or one eighth of the pound.

Queen Ælfgyfer, A. D. 1012, bequeathed two hundred mancusses of gold to a minster for the shrine there.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. i. 353, note.

mand1†, n. See *maund*1.

mand2†, v. t. [Early mod. E. also maund; < ME. manden, < OF. mander, < L. mandare, command. Cf. mandate, etc., command, commend, etc.] To command.

The king maunded him her strayght to marry,
And for killyng her brother he must dye.
2d Part of Promos and Cassandra, iv. 2. (Halliwell.) mand3†, n. [By apheresis from demand.] A demand.

The emperour, with wordes myld,
Askyd a mand of the chyld.
MS. Ashmole 61, f. 87. (Halliwell.)

mand4 (mand), n. [< Hind. mandoā, manduā, manrvā.] A species of grass. See Eleusine.

Mandæan (man-dē'an), n. and a. [< NL. Mandæus, < Mandæan Mandā, knowledge, gnosis.]

I. n. 1. One of a very ancient religious body, still found, though its members are few, in the southern part of Babylonia. The religion of the Mandæans is a kind of Gnosticism, retaining many Jewish and Parsee elements. They worship as divine beings a number of personifications, especially of the attributes or names of God. Also called Mendaites, Nasoreans, and Sabians, and, by a misunderstanding, Christians of St. John.

2. The dialect of Aramaic in which the four sacred books of the Mandæans are written.

II. a. Pertaining to the Mandæans or to Mandæism.

Also Mendæan.

Mandæism (man-dē'izm), n. [< Mandæ(an) + -ism.] The religious system of the Mandæans. Also Mendæism.

mandamus (man-dā'mus), n. [< L. mandamus, we command (the first word in the writ in the orig. L. form), 1st pers. pl. ind. pres. of mandare, command: see mandate.] In law, a writ issuing from a superior court, directed to an inferior court, an officer, a corporation, or other body, requiring the person or persons addressed to do some act therein specified, as being within their office and duty, as to admit or restore a person to an office or franchise, or to deliver papers, affix a seal to a paper, etc. Its use is generally confined to cases of complaint by some person having an interest in the performance of a public duty, when effectual relief against its neglect cannot be had in the course of an ordinary action.

During the short restoration of Henry VI. in 1470, . . . a lord mayor was appointed by royal mandamus.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 488.

Alternative mandamus, a mandamus in which the command to do the specified act is coupled with an alternative to the effect that, if it be not done, the party commanded show cause to the court why not.—Peremptory mandamus, a mandamus in which the command is absolute. It usually follows an alternative writ if adequate cause be not shown.

mandamus (man-dā'mus), v. t. [< mandamus, n.] To issue a mandamus to; serve with a mandamus.

Her officers . . . were mandamused to compel them to do their duty. N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 135.

★mandant (man'dant), a. and n. [< L. mandan(t-)s, ppr. of mandare, command: see *mand*2, mandate.] Commanding; a mandator.

mandarin (man'da-rin), n. and a. [Formerly also (as a noun) mandarine, mandareen; = F. mandarin, a mandarin (mandarine, a mandarin orange, a tangerine), = It. mandarino = Sp. mandarin, < Pg. mandarim (with final -m for -n, as reg. in Pg.), a mandarin, < Malay mantrī, < Hind. mantrī, a councilor, minister of state, < Skt. mantrin, a councilor, minister of state, < mantra, counsel, advice, < √ man, think: see *mind*1.]

I. n. 1. Any Chinese official, civil or military, who wears a button. (See button, 3.) The Chinese equivalent is kwan, which means simply 'public servant.'

There are without the city [Pequin] . . . twenty-four thousand sepulchers of mandarines (Justices of Peace) with their little gilded chappels.
S. Clarke, Geograph. Descrip. (1671), p. 39.

2. [cap.] The form of Chinese spoken (with slight variations) in the northern, central, and western provinces of China, as well as Manchuria, and by officials and educated persons all over the empire, as distinguished from the local dialects spoken chiefly in the southern provinces, and from the book-language, which appeals only to the eye.—3. In ornith., the mandarin duck (which see, under *duck*2).—4. A piece of mandarin porcelain.—5. A coal-tar color used in dyeing, produced from beta-naphthol. It dyes a bright reddish-orange shade. Also called tropæolin.—6. A small variety of orange. See orange. Often mandarine.

Mandarin Duck (Aix galericulata).

II. a. Pertaining or suitable to a mandarin or to mandarins; hence, of exalted character or quality; superior; noble; fine.—Mandarin dialect, language. See I., 2.—Mandarin porcelain, decorative porcelain thought to be of Japanese origin, but sometimes apparently of Chinese make and painting, having as a part of its decoration figures of Chinese officials in their ceremonial dress. Vases of this character are decorated in brilliant colors.—Mandarin sleeve, a loose and wide sleeve, supposed to be copied from the sleeves of the silk gowns of Chinese gentlemen.—Mandarin vases. See mandarin porcelain.

mandarin (man'da-rin), v. t. [< mandarin, n. (with ref. to mandarin orange).] In dyeing, to give an orange-color to, as silk or other stuffs made of animal fiber, not by means of a solution of coloring matter, but by the action of dilute nitric acid. The orange-color is produced by a partial decomposition of the surface of the fiber by the acid.

mandarinate (man'da-rin-āt), n. [< mandarin + *-ate*3.] 1. The office or authority of a mandarin.—2. The whole body of mandarins; mandarins collectively.—3. The jurisdiction or district of a mandarin.

The Emperor and the great tribunals . . . would call them to account for not having sooner been aware of what was passing in their Mandarinates.
Huc, Journey through the Chinese Empire (trans.), I. 68.

The idea of organizing a sort of intellectual mandarinate in France was first conceived by Colbert.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 501.

mandariness (man-da-rēn'es or man'da-rin-es), n. [< mandarin + -ess.] A female mandarin. Lamb.

mandarinic (man-da-rin'ik), a. [< mandarin + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or befitting a mandarin.

mandarinism (man-da-rēn'izm or man'da-rin-izm), n. [< mandarin + -ism.] The character or customs of mandarins; government by mandarins.

The whole Chinese code, under a systematic mandarinism, is pervaded even by the principle of self-accusation for all. Lieber.

mandat (mon-dä'), n. [F.: see mandate.] 1. In French law, a grant of power or authority; a power of attorney.

Mandats or grants in expectancy.
Hallam, Middle Ages, II. 242.

2. In French hist., one of the circulating notes which were issued by the government about 1796 on the security of the national domains, called mandats territoriaux, to take the place of the abrogated assignats, and which soon became as worthless as the latter.

mandatary (man'da-tā-ri), n.; pl. mandataries (-riz). [= F. mandataire = Sp. Pg. It. mandatario, < LL. mandatarius, one to whom a charge or commission is given, < L. mandatum, a charge, command: see mandate.] One to whom a command or charge is given; one who has received and holds a mandate to act for another; an attorney. Specifically—(a) A person to whom the Pope has by his prerogative given a mandate or order for his benefice. (b) In law, one who is authorized and undertakes, without a recompense, to do some act for another in respect to the thing bailed to him. See mandate, 4. Also mandatory.

mandate (man'dāt), n. [= F. mandat = Sp. Pg. It. mandato, < L. mandatum, a charge, order, command, commission, injunction, neut. of mandatus, pp. of mandare, commit to one's charge, order, command, commission, lit. put into one's hands, < manus, hand, + dare, put: see *date*1. Cf. command, commend, demand, remand. See maundy, an older form of mandate.] 1. A command; an order, precept, or injunction; a commission.

I am commanded home. Get you away;
I'll send for you anon. Sir, I obey the mandate,
And will return to Venice. Shak., Othello, iv. 1. 270.

This dream all-powerful Juno sends; I bear
Her mighty mandates, and her words you hear.
Dryden, Æneid, vii. 583.

Mandates for deposing sovereigns were sealed with the signet of "the fisherman." Burke, Rev. in France.

This flower border encloses an autograph Latin mandate, written and signed "propriâ manu" by "J. Hereforden" himself; which mandate testifies that the volume of the book is prepared and written by his "dilectus famulus" Swithun Butterfield, and directs that S. B. shall have the custody of it during his natural life.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 2.

Hence—2. An official command addressed by a superior to an inferior, to control his conduct in a specific manner. Specifically—(a) In Rom. law, an order or decree directed by the emperor to governors of provinces. (b) In canon law, a papal rescript commanding a bishop or other ecclesiastical patron to put the person therein named in possession of the first vacant benefice under his patronage. (c) In early Eng. law, a royal command addressed to a judge or court to control the disposition of a suit. (d) In mod. law procedure, a judicial command, order, precept, or writ; more specifically, the document promulgated upon the decision of an appeal or writ of error, as by the Supreme Court of the United States, directing what shall be done in the court below; also, in some of the States, the writ elsewhere known, as at common law, by the name of mandamus (which see). In this sense mandate usually, but not always necessarily, implies that the direction is given in writing.

3. In early Rom. law (before the doctrines of agency were developed), a trust or commission by which one person, called the mandator, requested another, the mandatarius, to act in his own name and as if for himself in a particular transaction (special mandate), or in all the affairs of the former (general mandate). The mandatarius was the only one recognized as having legal rights and responsibilities as toward third persons in the transactions involved. As between him and the mandator, however, the latter was entitled to all benefit, and bound to indemnify against losses, etc.; but the service was gratuitous.

4. In civil law: (a) A contract of bailment in which a thing is transferred by the mandator to the possession of the mandatary, upon an undertaking of the latter to perform gratuitously some service in reference to it: distinguished from a mere deposit for safe keeping. (b) A contract of agency by which the mandator confides a matter of business, or his business generally, to an agent called the mandatary. If the authority or appointment be in writing, the mandate is also called procuration. Mandatary qualification exists where a person induces another to repose credit in a third person; it answers somewhat to our modern letter of credit.

mandate-bread (man'dāt-bred), n. The bread distributed to the poor on Maundy Thursday. Also called maundy-loaves.

Mandate Thursday (man'dāt thėrz'dā). Same as Maundy Thursday (which see, under maundy).

mandator (man-dā'tor), n. [< L. mandator, one who gives a charge or command, < mandare, charge, command: see *mand*2, mandate.] 1. A director.

A person is said to be a client to his advocate, but a master and mandator to his proctor. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. In law: (a) A bailor of goods. (b) The person who delegates another to perform a mandate. (c) In civil law, the person who employs another (called a mandatarius or mandatary) to convey goods gratuitously, or in a gratuitous agency.

mandatory (man′dā-tō-ri), a. and n. [< LL. mandatorius, of or belonging to a mandator, < mandator, one who commands: see mand[2], mandate.] I. a. Of the nature of a mandate; containing a command or mandate; directory.

A superiority of power mandatory, judicial, and coercive over other ministers. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 3.

It doth not appear that he usurped more than a mandatory nomination of the bishop to be consecrated. Abp. Ussher, Ordination, p. 221.

Mandatory injunction. See injunction.—Mandatory statute, a statute the effect of which is that, if its provisions are not complied with according to their terms, the thing done is, as to it, void (Bishop): contradistinguished from directory statute.

II. n.; pl. mandatories (-riz). Same as mandatary.

Acting as the mouthpiece, more than the mandatory, of Europe. Lowe, Bismarck, II. 92.

mandatum (man-dā′tum), n. [ML.: see mandate, maundy.] Same as maundy.

mandell (man′del), n. Same as mandil[2].

mandelstone (man′del-stōn), n. [Accom. of G. mandelstein (= D. mandelsteen = Dan. Sw. mandelsten), almond-stone, < mandel, = E. almond, + stein = E. stone.] Same as amygdaloid.

mandement† (man′de-mẹnt), n. [ME., = F. mandement = Pr. mandamen = Sp. mandamiento = Pg. It. mandamento, < ML. mandamentum, a command, < mandare, command: see mandate.] A mandate or commandment.

Ye haue herde the maundement that the Romayns haue sent that I-nough haue vs contraried. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 641.

He schewed the erle Rogere the pape's mandement. Rob. of Brunne, p. 307.

mander, v. i. See maunder.

manderil† (man′dėr-il), n. An obsolete variant of mandrel.

Mandevilla (man-dē-vil′ä), n. [NL. (Lindley, 1840), named after H. J. Mandeville, British minister at Buenos Ayres.] A genus of American apocynaceous plants of the tribe Echitideæ and the subtribe Euechitideæ. The flowers grow in simple racemes, and have a funnel-shaped corolla, a calyx with five scales or an indefinite number of glands, and a disk which is five-parted or has five scales. They are tall climbing shrubs, with opposite feather-veined leaves, and simple racemes of yellow, white, or rarely violet flowers, which are usually large and showy. About 45 species have been described, from Mexico, the West Indies, and tropical America. M. suaveolens, known as the Chile jasmine, is remarkable for its very fragrant snowy-white flowers, and is common in cultivation.

mandevillet, n. [An erroneous form of mantevil: prob. conformed to the surname Mandeville.] Same as mandilion.

mandible[1] (man′di-bl), n. [= F. mandibule = Sp. mandíbula = It. mandibula, mandibola, < NL. mandibula, mandible, < LL. mandibula, f., also mandibulum, n., a jaw, < L. mandere, chew, masticate.] In zoöl. and anat., a jaw-bone; a jaw, or the jaw-bone and associate parts; especially, the under jaw. (a) In man and other mammals, the under jaw, or inferior maxillary, as distinguished from the upper jaw, maxilla, or superior maxillary. (b) In birds, either part, upper or under, of the beak; that part of either jaw which is covered with horny integument, the two being distinguished as upper and lower. When the term mandible is applied to the lower only, the upper is called maxilla. See cut under bill. (c) In the arthropods, especially insects, either half, right or left, of the first, upper, or outer pair of jaws, considered by some to correspond to the lower jaw of vertebrates; morphologically, one of the first pair of gnathites, always devoid of a palp: opposed to maxilla, which is either half of the second pair of jaws. See cut under mouth-part. (d) In cephalopods, the horny beak or rostrum. See mandibular.—Dentate mandible. See dentate.—Multidentate mandible, in entom., a mandible having many teeth or processes on the inner side.

mandible[2]† (mȧn′di-bl), a. [Prop. mandable; < mand[3] + -able.] Demandable.

Thus we rambled up and down the Country; and where the people demean'd themselves not civil to us by voluntary contributions, their Geese, Hens, Pigs, or any such mandible thing we met with, made us satisfaction for their hidebound injuries. Richard Head, English Rogue (1665).

mandibular (man-dib′ū-lär), a. [= F. mandibulaire = Sp. mandibular; as mandible[1] (NL. mandibula) + -ar[3].] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of a mandible.—Mandibular arch, in embryol., of vertebrates, the first postoral visceral arch of the embryo; that arch in which Meckel's cartilage is developed.—Mandibular ramus. (a) In ornith., either fork of the under mandible. (b) In mammal., the more or less upright proximal part of either half of the mandible, as distinguished from the body or horizontal part of the same bone.—Mandibular scrobes, in entom., grooves on the outer sides of the mandibles, found in most Carabidæ.—Mandibular segment or ring, in entom., the first primary segment behind the mouth-cavity, bearing the mandibles. Some anatomists suppose that it forms the genæ or cheeks.—Mandibular tomia, the cutting edges of the under mandible of a bird.

mandibulary (man-dib′ū-lā-ri), a. [< mandible[1] (NL. mandibula) + -ary.] Same as mandibular.

The mandibulary symphysis is not by suture, but by an elastic band. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 189.

Mandibulata (man-dib-ū-lā′tạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of mandibulatus: see mandibulate.] In entom.: (a) In some systems, a primary group or division of Insecta, containing those insects whose mouth-parts are mandibulate or masticatory, as distinguished from those which have the same parts haustellate or suctorial, the former being fitted for biting, the latter for sucking: opposed to Haustellata. Westwood called the same division Dacnostomata. (b) A division of Anoplura, including mandibulate lice, as the bird-lice or Mallophaga. [The term was first used in the former sense by Clairville (1798), who divided each of his main groups of Insectes (Pterophora and Aptera) into Mandibulata and Haustellata. In Macleay's celebrated system it was the name of one of the five groups of his Annulosa.]

mandibulate (man-dib′ū-lāt), a. and n. [< NL. mandibulatus, < mandibula, mandible: see mandible[1].] I. a. 1. In entom.: (a) Having mandibles, and thus able to bite, as an insect; of or pertaining to the Mandibulata: distinguished from haustellate or suctorial. (b) Masticatory, as the jaws of an insect.—2. Having a lower jaw, as nearly all vertebrates: opposed to emandibulate.—Mandibulate mouth. Same as masticatory mouth (which see, under masticatory).

II. n. A mandibulate insect, as a beetle.

mandibulated (man-dib′ū-lā-ted), a. [< mandibulate + -ed[2].] Same as mandibulate.

mandibuliform (man-dib′ū-li-fôrm), a. [< NL. mandibula, mandible, + L. forma, form.] Having the form of a mandible in general: specifically applied to the under jaws or maxillæ of an insect when they are hard, horny, and mandibulate or fitted for biting, like the mandibles proper.

mandibulohyoid (man-dib″ū-lō-hī′oid), a. [< NL. mandibula, mandible, + hyoid.] Pertaining to the lower jaw and the hyoid bone: as, the mandibulohyoid ligament of a shark.

mandibulomaxillary (man-dib″ū-lō-mak′si-lā-ri), a. [< NL. mandibula, mandible, + maxilla, maxilla.] In Crustacea, of or pertaining to the mandibles and to the maxillæ; situated between these parts: as, a mandibulomaxillary apodeme.

mandiet, n. See maundy.

mandil[1]† (man′dil), n. [< OF. mandil, mandille (?), F. mandille (> Sp. Pg. mandil), < L. mantile, also mantele, mantelium, a towel, napkin, table-cloth, mantelum, mantellum, a mantle: see mantle, mantel.] Same as mandilion.

mandil[2] (man′dil), n. [Also mundil; < Ar. Turk. mendīl, a kerchief; < L. mantile: see mandil[1].] Among Moslems, a kind of kerchief, especially one oblong in shape, the short sides worked with gold or colored silk, the rest plain. R. F. Burton, tr. of Arabian Nights, II. 301, note.

mandilion† (man-dil′yon), n. [Also mandillion, mandilian; < OF. mandillon, < mandil, a mantle: see mandil[1].] A garment first used in France in the sixteenth century, and worn originally by men-servants, soldiers, and others as a sort of overcoat. Its earliest form appears to have been that of a dalmatic with sleeves not closed and covering the back of the arm only. In the seventeenth century it was an outer garment capable of being buttoned up or left open, described in 1660 as like a jump, generally without sleeves.

About him a mandilion, that did with buttons meet,
Of purple, large, and full of folds, curled with a warmful nap,
A garment that 'gainst cold in night did soldiers use to wrap. Chapman, Iliad, x. 134.

A Spaniard, having a Moore slave, let him goe a long time in a poore ragged mandilian without sleeves; one asking him why he dealt so sleevelessly with the poore wretch, he answered: I crop his wings, for feare he flie away. Copley, Wits, Fits, and Fancies (1614). (Nares.)

But in time of war they wear crimson mandilions, behind and before so crossed, over their armour. Sandys, Travailes, p. 179.

mandioc (man′di-ok), n. [< Braz. mandioca.] Same as manioc.

mandioca (man-di-ō′kạ), n. Same as manioc.

mandlestone, n. See mandelstone.

mandment†, n. [Early mod. E. mandement, < ME. maundement, < OF. mandement, command, < ML. mandamentum, command, < mandare, command: see mand[2], mandate.] A commandment.

He salle have maundement to morne or myddaye be roungene, mandola, mandora (man-dō′lä, -rä), n. [It.: see mandolin.] An older and larger variety of the mandolin. Compare pandura. Also mandore.
To what marche thay salle merke, with mangere to lengene. Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 1587.

mandolin, mandoline (man′dọ-lin), n. [< F. mandoline, < It. mandolino, dim. of mandola, mandora, var. forms of pandora, a kind of lute: see mandore, bandore[1], pandore.] A musical instrument of the lute class, having from four to six single or double metallic strings, which are stretched over an almond-shaped body, and a neck with numerous frets. It is played with a plectrum of tortoise-shell held in the right hand. The tuning of the strings varies somewhat, but the compass is usually about three octaves upward from the G next below middle C. The tone is tinkling, but penetrating and agreeable.

mandolinist (man′dọ-lin-ist), n. [< mandolin + -ist.] One who performs on a mandolin.

mandom (man′dum), n. [< man + -dom.] Humanity in general; men collectively considered. [Rare.]

Nay, without this law
Of mandom, ye would perish—beast by beast Devouring. Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

mandora, n. See mandola.

mandore (man-dōr′), n. [< F. mandore, < It. mandora: see mandola.] Same as mandola.

mandorla (man′dôr-lạ), n. [It.] 1. In decorative art, a space, opening, panel, or the like, of an oval shape; also, a work of art filling such a space, as a bas-relief, or the like.—2. Eccles., the vesica piscis.

Mandorla.—From Assumption of the Madonna, by Orcagna; Church of Or San Michele, Florence.

In a fourth relief upon the high altar, Christ seated within a mandorla blesses with his right hand. C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, [Int., p. xx.

mandragt, mandraget, n. Obsolete forms of mandrake.

mandragont, n. An obsolete variant of mandrake. Cotgrave.

mandragora (man-drag′ọ-rä), n. [= F. mandragore = Sp. mandrágora = Pg. mandragora = It. mandragora, mandragola, < L. mandragoras (NL. mandragora), < Gr. μανδραγόρας, the mandrake: see mandrake.] 1†. The mandrake.

Not poppy, nor mandragora,
Nor all the drowsy syrups of the world,
Shall ever medicine thee to that sweet sleep
Which thou owedst yesterday. Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 330.

Come, violent death,
Serve for mandragora, to make me sleep.
Webster, Duchess of Malfi, iv. 2.

2. [cap.] A genus of plants belonging to the Solanaceæ, or nightshade family, and the tribe Atropeæ. The corolla is induplicate in the bud, the calyx is foliaceous and five-parted, and the pedicels are partially clustered among the radical leaves. They are herbs, nearly stemless, rising from a thick, fleshy, often forked root, and bear tufts of large, ovate, lance-shaped leaves, and quite large pale bluish-violet, white, or purple flowers, which are reticulately veined. Three or four species are recognized, found in the Mediterranean region and in the Himalayas. The ordinary plant has been commonly known as M. officinarum. Other species are M. autumnalis and M. caulescens. The mandragora or mandrake has long been known in medicine, and has been the subject of much superstition. See mandrake.

mandrake (man′drāk), n. [< ME. mandrake, mondrake, mandrake; an alteration, appar. simulating drake[2], of earlier ME. mandrag, mandrage, short for mandragora, q. v. To the peculiar form of the root, and the suggestive form of the name mandrake, appar. a compound of man + drake[2], with little meaning attached to the supposed second element, are due in large part the superstitions associated with the plant.] 1. A plant of the genus Mandragora. The mandrake has poisonous properties, and acts as an emetic, purgative, and narcotic. It was in use in ancient times especially for its narcotic effects, and is said to have been employed as an anesthetic. It has been regarded as an aphrodisiac, and used in amorous incantations, as a love-amulet, etc. According to an old fancy the mandrake shrieks when pulled from the ground. The resemblance of its commonly forked root to the human body is probably the ground of this superstition, as well as of the repute of the plant as an aphrodisiac.

Flowering Plant of Mandrake (Mandragora officinarum).

And Reuben went in the days of wheat harvest, and found mandrakes in the field, and brought them unto his mother Leah. Gen. xxx. 14.

And shrieks, like mandrakes torn out of the earth,
That living mortals, hearing them, run mad.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 3. 47.

The mandrake, a plant with broad leaves and bright yellow flowers and with a root which grew in a semi-human form, was found beneath the public gallows and was dragged from the ground and carried home with many extraordinary ceremonies. When secured, it became a familiar spirit speaking in oracles if properly consulted, and bringing good luck to the household in which it was enshrined. C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 220.

The best digest of the various speculations as to the mandrake and its properties will be found in Dr. Harris's "Dictionary of the Natural History of the Bible."
N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 220.

2. The May-apple, Podophyllum peltatum. [U.S.]

The blushing peach and glossy plum there lies,
And with the mandrake tempt your hands and eyes.
Jane Turrell, quoted in Tuckerman's America and her Commentators, p. 33.

3. In her., a figure resembling a root with two long and pointed bifurcations usually twisted together, and the whole crowned with leaves and berries.

mandrel, mandril (man′drel, -dril), n. [An alteration of mandrin*, < F. mandrin, a mandrel, former, strike, perhaps < L. mandra, a stall, < Gr. μάνδρα, a stall, the bed in which the stone of a ring is set: see madrigal.] 1. In mech., a cylindrical bar or spindle, either of uniform diameter, of different diameters, or tapered, used for a variety of purposes, but chiefly for the support of objects formed with holes, into which the mandrel is forcibly driven in order to hold them firmly while turning in a lathe, or in an analogous machine, or in operating upon them with a file. Specifically—(a) An axis attached to the head-stock of a lathe, to support, during the process of turning, any material which is bored or pierced with a central hole. It has often some adjustable device for securing it to the material, and is then known as an adjustable mandrel. (b) Any arbor or axis to support a tool, as a mandrel for a circular saw or circular cutter. (c) A bar used in making cylindrical forgings. (d) A plug-core for metal or glass castings.

2. A miners' pick. [Eng.]—3. In metal-working by the spinning process, the form, usually of wood, upon which the thin plate of metal or blank is pressed in order that the revolution may give it the form of the mandrel.—Adjustable mandrel. See def. 1 (a).—Expanding mandrel, a mandrel constructed to engage and firmly hold a piece of material on the inside of a hole of uniform diameter, for turning, etc. Such mandrels are of various construction. A common form is a central arbor having grooves with inclined plane bottoms in which move simultaneously and equally tapered key-slides, the outer sides of which are always parallel with each other and with the axis of the arbor. When moved longitudinally, these slides expand against the inside of the hole with force, holding the piece by jamming friction.—Flexible mandrel, a spiral spring placed in a metal tube to prevent it from flattening or collapsing when bent.—Hicks's mandrel, an expanding mandrel for turning rings, named from its inventor. It is an arbor with a cone in the middle, in the periphery of which, at equal distances from each other, are formed longitudinal dovetailed grooves carrying wedge-shaped slides actuated simultaneously and equally by a nut on the end of the cone, and thus expanded to fit the bore of the ring to be turned.—Traversing mandrel. (a) A mandrel which moves longitudinally. (b) A mandrel fitted to a bearing or bearings of a support which may be set in the tool-post of the slide-rest of a lathe, or in some other traversing device. Such mandrels are used for expanding reamers and analogous tools, and they are usually driven by a pulley-and-belt mechanism.

mandrel (man′drel), v. t. [< mandrel, n.] To operate upon with mandrels, as a bronze gun. This is done by driving steel mandrels of gradually increasing size through the bore, whereby the strength of the gun is greatly increased, the limit of elasticity being in some cases nearly or quite doubled.

mandrel-collar (man′drel-kol″ăr), n. A collar formed on the mandrel of a lathe, against which the chucks, face-plates, etc., abut squarely when screwed upon the mandrel-nose.

mandrel-frame (man′drel-frām), n. A frame or head-stock secured by bolts to the end of a lathe-bed to support the mandrel.

mandrel-lathe (man′drel-lāᵺ), n. A lathe adapted for turning long work and hollow work. It is so designed that the material for hollow work can be clasped by a chuck on the end of the mandrel in the head-stock. Long work is supported in the lathe by the head and tail centers. E. H. Knight.

mandrel-nose (man′drel-nōz), n. The inner end of a lathe-mandrel, upon which a screw-thread is formed for receiving and holding face-plates, chucks, etc.

mandrel-screw (man′drel-skrö), n. The screw on the mandrel-nose to which chucks, face-plates, etc., are fitted, and by which they are attached to the mandrel.

mandril, n. See mandrel.

mandrill (man′dril), n. [= F. mandrill = Sp. mandril = It. mandrillo, a mandrill; said to be from a native W. African name. If this form is original, the form drill in same sense is due to a false division of the word, as if < E. man + drill: see drill[4]. If drill is original, the form mandrill is an E. compound, and the F. Sp. It. forms are from E.] A kind of baboon; the great blue-faced or rib-nosed baboon; the hog-ape, Cynocephalus maimon or mormon, the largest and most formidable, ferocious, and hideous of baboons. The canine teeth are of enormous size, causing a protuberance of the face, which is naked and fantastically striped with brilliant blue. The ischial callosities are of great size and bright-red color. The animal is often seen in captivity. The mandrills are natives of the western coast of Africa, where they associate in large troops, which are the terror of the negroes. They often plunder villages and cultivated fields with impunity. See cut under baboon.

manducable (man′dū-ka-bl), a. [= F. Sp. manducable, < L. as if manducabilis*, < manducare, chew: see manducate.] Capable of being manducated or chewed; fit to be eaten.

If tangible by his fingers, why not by his teeth—that is, manducable? Coleridge.

manducate (man′dū-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. manducated, ppr. manducating. [< L. manducatus, pp. of manducare (> It. manducare = Sp. Pg. manducar, chew, = F. manger, > E. mange, eat), chew, masticate, eat by chewing, a lengthened form of mandere, chew: see mandible, mange, etc.] To masticate; chew.

It is gravel in the teeth, and a man must drink the blood of his own gums when he manducates such unwholesome, such unpleasant fruit.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 719.

manducation (man-dū-kā′shọn), n. [= F. manducation = Sp. manducación, < LL. manducatio(n-), < L. manducare, chew: see manducate.] The act of eating or chewing; in theol., participation in the eucharist.

After the manducation of the paschal lamb, it was the custom of the nation to sit down to a second supper.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 290.

The sum, then, of Archbishop Cranmer's doctrine on this head is: 1. That John vi. is not to be interpreted of oral manducation in the sacrament.
Waterland, Works, VII. 141.

manducatory (man′dū-kā-tọ-ri), a. [< manducate + -ory.] Pertaining to or employed in chewing; in entom., specifically, having a mandibulate form for eating.

manducus (man-dū′kus), n. [L., a glutton, a chewer, esp. as in def., < mandere, chew: see manducate.] In Rom. antiq., a comic character of Italic origin, wearing a mask with gaping jaws set with great teeth, which were made to clash against each other. This personage figured in various public processions as well as in comedies on the stage, and served Roman mothers as a bugbear in restraint of childish misconduct.

mandyas (man′di-as), n. [< Gr. μανδύας, μανδύα, a woolen cloak, LGr. as in def.; said to be of Pers. origin.] In the Gr. Ch., a kind of large and loose mantle, resembling a cope, fastened at the throat and sometimes at the lower corners also, and reaching almost to the feet. It is worn by monks and nuns, by archimandrites, and at times by bishops who were regularly appointed from the monastic orders. The mandyas of a prelate has wavy stripes upon it, while that of an archimandrite is plain.

Mandy Thursday†. Same as Maundy Thursday (which see, under maundy).

mane (mān), n. [< ME. mane, mayne, < AS. manu (in one gloss; indicated also by the cognate forms, and by the derivs. gemane*, gemone, maned, and mene = OS. meni = OHG. menni = Icel. men, a necklace) = OFries. mona = MD. mane, D. maan, manen = OHG. mana, MHG. mane, man, G. mane, now commonly mähne = Icel. mön = Sw. Dan. man, mane (cf. deriv. Icel. makki = Sw. Dan. manke, the upper part of a horse's neck); orig. prob. simply 'neck'; = W. mwn, neck (> myngen, mane), = Ir. muin, neck (> muince, collar), = Skt. manyā, the nape of the neck, = Gr. dial. μάννος, μάνος, μόννος, a necklace, μαννάκιον, μανιάκης, a necklace; cf. L. monile, a necklace.] The long hair growing on the neck and neighboring parts of some animals, as the horse, lion, etc., as distinguished from the shorter hair elsewhere. When, as in the horse, it grows on the middle line of the back of the neck, the mane commonly falls on one side, but it may be stiff and erect. In the lion the long and shaggy mane covers the whole neck and part of the fore quarters.

Thin mane, thick tail, broad buttock, tender hide;
Look, what a horse should have he did not lack.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 298.

Each wave was crested with tawny foam,
Like the mane of a chestnut steed.
Scott, L. of L. M., i. 28.

Maggie . . . looked over the book, eagerly seizing one corner and tossing back her mane.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 3.

man-eater (man′ē″tėr), n. 1. A cannibal.—2. In India, a tiger that has acquired a taste for human flesh; a tiger supposed or known to have a special propensity for killing and eating human beings. The name is sometimes extended to the lion and the hyena, on the same supposition.

The regular man-eater is generally an old tiger whose vigour is passed, and whose teeth are worn and defective; it takes up its abode in the neighbourhood of a village, the population of which it finds an easier prey than the larger or wilder animals. W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 386.

3. One of several kinds of large sharks supposed to be specially formidable to man; specifically, Carcharodon carcharias, a very large shark of the family Lamnidæ. This shark has straight narrow triangular teeth, very slightly serrated or crenulated, in both jaws. The body is stout and fusiform, with a pointed snout; there are two dorsal fins, one large, between the pectorals and the ventrals, the other small and posterior; the anal fin is like the second dorsal; the caudal fin is crescentiform; and there are five branchial apertures, all in front of the pectorals. It has been found 40 feet long, though it averages so much less that 13 feet is a good size. It is a shark of the high seas, found in nearly all tropical waters, frequently passing a considerable distance both northward and southward. Teeth much like those of the living species have been found in the Pliocene and Miocene deposits, as well as in the ooze of the Pacific ocean, indicating individuals that must have been about 80 feet long.

4. The dobson or hellgrammite. [Local, U. S.]

mane-comb (mān′kōm), n. A comb for combing a horse's mane and tail.

A third class of the street-sellers of tools are the vendors of curry-combs and brushes, mane-combs, scrapers, and clipping instruments.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 400.

maned (mānd), a. [< mane + -ed[2].] 1. Having a mane, as a horse or lion; jubate.

He said, and to his chariot joined his steeds
Swift, brazen-hoofed, and maned with wavy gold.
Cowper, Iliad, viii. 49.

2. In her., same as crined.—Maned ant-eater, Myrmecophaga jubata.—Maned fruit-bat, Pteropus jubatus, a native of the Philippine Islands.

manège (ma-nāzh′), n. and a. [< F. manège = Sp. Pg. manejo, < It. maneggio, the handling or training of a horse, riding, a riding-school: see manage, n.] I. n. 1. The art of breaking, training, and riding horses; the art of horsemanship.—2. A school for training horses and teaching horsemanship.

II.† a. Managed: said of a horse.

I sent my black manege horse and furniture with a friend to his Matie then at Oxford.
Evelyn, Diary, July 12, 1643.

maneh (man′e), n. [Heb.] A Babylonian and Hebrew weight. See mina[1].

maneless (mān′les), a. [< mane + -less.] Having no mane: as, the maneless lion of Guzerat, a recognized variety of Felis leo.

man-engine (man′en″jin), n. A form of elevator or power-ladder used in some deep mines for raising and lowering men. In its usual form it is essentially a vertical rod extending from the surface to the bottom of the mine, and reciprocated upward and downward, like a pump-rod, by means of a steam-engine or a water-wheel. The length of stroke commonly adopted is 12 feet, and at intervals equal to the stroke platforms are fastened to the rod, with corresponding platforms in the shaft, on either side of the rod, at points corresponding to the limits of the stroke, both up and down. A man in descending steps on a platform on the rod just as the down stroke begins, and steps off on the platform in the shaft which he reaches at the end of the stroke, repeating the operation until he attains his destination. A man in ascending steps on a platform on the rod as the upward stroke begins, and leaves it at the end of the stroke. Ascent and descent may proceed simultaneously without interruption, the fixed platforms on one side of the shaft being reserved for men ascending, and those on the other side for men descending, each man stepping on his proper platform on the reciprocating rod as it is vacated, at the moment of rest between the strokes, by the man who is traveling in the opposite direction. This is the form of man-engine used in Cornwall. That employed in the Harz mines (where the method originated) is the "double-rod engine," with two rods moving up and down alternately in opposite directions. This contrivance corresponds to a ladder with movable steps, the miner having nothing to do but to move slightly sidewise in order to place himself on the step which is about to go up or down, according as he wishes to ascend or descend. In the United States cages, and in some mines man-cars, are used instead of man-engines. See man-car.

manent (mā′nent). [L., 3d pers. pl. pres. ind. of manere, remain: see remain.] They remain (on the stage): a stage direction. Compare manet.

manequin (man′e-kin), n. Same as manikin, 4.

maner[1]†, n. An obsolete form of manner[1].

maner[2]†, n. Same as mainor.

maneria (ma-nē′ri-ạ), n. [ML.: see manner[1].] In Gregorian music, a mixed mode — that is, one that includes the compass both of an authentic and of its plagal mode. Polyphonic music for unequal voices is necessarily thus written. See mode[1], 7.

manerial† (ma-nē′ri-ạl), a. An obsolete variant of manorial.

manerly†, adv. An obsolete form of mannerly.

manes (mā′nēz), n. pl. [L., prob. < OL. manis, manus, good.] 1. In Rom. antiq., the spirits of the dead considered as tutelary divinities of their families; the deified shades of the dead, according to the belief that the soul continued to exist and to have relations with earth after the body had perished. Three times a year a pit called the mundus was officially opened in the comitium of the Roman Forum, to permit the manes to come forth. The manes were also honored at certain festivals, as the Parentalia and Feralia; oblations were made to them, and the flame maintained on the altar of the household was a homage to them. [In this sense often written with a capital.]

> The most special representatives of ancestor-worship in Europe were perhaps the ancient Romans, whose word manes has become the recognized name for ancestral deities in modern civilized language; they embodied them as images, set them up as household patrons, gratified them with offerings and solemn homage, and, counting them as or among the infernal gods, inscribed on tombs D. M., "Diis Manibus."
>
> E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 109.

Hence — 2. The spirit of a deceased person, or the shades of the dead, whether considered as the object of a cult or not.

> Some sages have thought it pious to preserve a certain reverence for the manes of their deceased friends.
> Steele, Tatler, No. 181.

3. By metonymy — (a) The lower world or infernal regions, as the abode of the manes. (b) The punishments imposed in the lower world.

> All have their manes, and those manes bear.
>
> Dryden, Æneid, vi. 743.

mane-sheet (mān′shēt), n. A covering for the neck and the top of the head of a horse.

manet (mā′net). [L., 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of manere, remain: see remain.] He (or she) remains (on the stage): a stage direction.

> Exeunt Philip, Pole, Paget, etc. Manet Mary.
> Tennyson, Queen Mary, iii. 2.

manetti (ma-net′i), n. [Named after the botanist, X. Manetti.] In hort., a variety of rose much used as a dwarf stock in budding.

maneuver, maneuvre, n. and v. See manœuver.

manful (man′fụl), a. [< ME. manful; < man + -ful.] Having or expressing the spirit of a man; manifesting the higher qualities of manhood; courageous; noble; high-minded.

> Ne grete emprises for to take on honde, > Shedyng of blode, ne manful hardinesse.
>
> Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight.
>
> Nor know I whether I be very base
> Or very manful, whether very wise
> Or very foolish.
>
> Tennyson, Geraint.

=Syn. Manly, etc. (see masculine); stout, strong, vigorous, undaunted, intrepid.

manfully (man′fụl-i), adv. In a manful manner; boldly; courageously.

manfulness (man′fụl-nes), n. The quality of being manful; boldness; nobleness.

man-fungus (man′fung″gus), n. A plant of the genus Geaster.

mang[1] (mang), n. A dialectal variant of mong[1].

mang[2] (mang), prep. A dialectal (Scotch) form of mong[3], among.

> Syne bad' him slip frae 'mang the folk,
> Some time when nae ane see'd him,
> And try 't that night.
>
> Burns, Halloween.

★manga (mang′gä), n. [ML.] Eccles., a case or cover; especially, the case for a processional or other cross when not in use, often of rich stuff or embroidered.

mangabey (mang′gạ-bā), n. [A geographical name in Madagascar, by Buffon applied erroneously to a kind of monkey not found there.] A monkey of the genus Cercocebus, of which there are several species, inhabiting Africa. They are of moderate size and slender form, have long limbs and tail, and are extremely agile. The face is more produced than in the species of Cercopithecus (from which Cercocebus is detached), the eyebrows are prominent, and the eyelids are white. The general color is dark or blackish. The sooty mangabey is C. fuliginosus; the white-eyed mangabey is C. æthiops, in which the crown is also white. C. collaris has a white collar. In C. albigena the crown is crested. Also written mangaby.

mangal, mankal (män-gäl′, -käl′), n. [Turk. mankāl, manghāl.] A brazier for a charcoal fire used in Turkey and throughout the Levant, usually of sheet-copper or sheet-brass worked into shape by the hammer, and frequently ornamented with designs in repoussé work.

manganapatite (mang-gạ-nap′ạ-tīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + apatite.] A variety of apatite, unusual in containing manganese. A dark bluish-green kind from Branchville in Connecticut afforded 10½ per cent. of manganese protoxid.

manganate (mang′gạ-nāt), n. [< mangan(ic) + -ate[1].] A compound of manganic acid with a base. Also manganesate.

mangancolumbite (mang″gan-kọ-lum′bīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + columbite.] A variety of columbite in which the iron is largely replaced by manganese.

manganeisen (man′gan-ī-zn), n. [< G. mangan, manganese, + eisen, iron.] Ferromanganese; a combination of the metals iron and manganese containing a large percentage (from 50 to 85 per cent.) of the latter. It is manufactured for use in the Bessemer process, and is an important adjunct to that operation. The object of the addition of the manganese at the termination of the "blow" is the removal of the oxygen in the iron, without at the same time adding carbon and silicon. This vitally important improvement of the Bessemer process is due to the Scotch metallurgist R. F. Mushet. See steel and spiegel.

manganesate (mang-gạ-nē′sāt), n. [< manganese + -ate[1].] Same as manganate.

★manganese (mang-gạ-nēs′, man′gạ-nēz), n. [= F. manganèse (> Sp. Pg. manganesa = It. manganese), < NL. manganesium, an altered form of magnesium, a name first given to this metal, but now used for a different metal.] Chemical symbol, Mn; atomic weight, 54.93. A metal having a remarkable affinity for, and in some respects a close resemblance to, iron, of which it is an extremely frequent associate. It differs from iron, however, in that it is not used at all by itself in the arts, although of great interest and importance as connected with the manufacture of iron, and as modifying by its presence in small quantity the character of the product obtained. The use of the black oxid of manganese for removing the coloring matters from glass was known to the ancients, and is mentioned by Pliny, but the nature of the material thus used was not understood until quite modern times. This ignorance was shown in the confusion of the oxid of manganese with the magnetic oxid of iron, the lodestone (Latin magnes and magnesius lapis), and the former was called magnesia by chemists in the middle ages, apparently in conformity with Pliny's idea of a dual (masculine and feminine) nature in some metals, manganese not having the attractive power of the magnet, and being on that account considered feminine. Other variants (in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries) of the name of the ore used by glass-makers were magnosia, mangadesum, and manganensis. After what we now call magnesia had received the name of magnesia alba, apparently from the idea that this substance was in some way related to the oxid of manganese, the latter began to be called magnesia nigra. From the middle of the eighteenth century the combinations of manganese were studied by various chemists, and finally, in 1774, the metal manganese was isolated by Gahn, but for years there was much confusion in regard to its specific name, and it was not until after the beginning of the 19th century that the name manganese (mangan in German) began to be generally adopted. The Latin termination -um (manganesium) is rarely used in modern technical works. This metal has never been found native. As eliminated from its ores by chemical processes, it is grayish-white in color, resembling cast-iron, but varying considerably in hardness and luster according to the nature of the methods by which it was obtained. It is very hard and brittle, and has a specific gravity of about 8. It oxidizes rapidly on exposure to the air. Manganese resembles iron in that its ores are widely diffused, and differs from that metal remarkably in the fact that, on the whole, its ores are only rarely found in considerable quantity in any one locality, while those of iron exist in abundance in many regions. The important ores of manganese are all oxids, and of these the peroxid (pyrolusite), called in commerce the black oxid of manganese, or simply manganese, is the most valuable and important. Other manganiferous minerals (all oxids) are braunite, hausmannite, psilomelane, and various earthy mixtures called bog-manganese, wad, cupreous manganese, etc. Practically, the ore called manganese in commerce is a mixture of various oxids, different samples differing greatly in value, which value has to be determined by chemical analysis. The ores and salts of manganese are of very considerable importance in chemical manufactures, both as bleaching and oxidizing reagents. The nature and importance of this metal in the manufacture of iron and steel will be found indicated under steel and spiegel. — Earthy manganese. See wad. — Gray manganese ore. Same as manganite. — Manganese bronze, an alloy said to be composed of ordinary bronze with the addition of manganese. It has the color of gun-metal, and its fracture resembles that of fine-grained steel. It is said to equal or excel in tenacity bar-iron of medium quality. It has been manufactured in England, but has not come into general use. — Manganese brown, green, violet, etc. See brown, etc. — Manganese copper. Same as manganese bronze. — Manganese epidote, piedmontite. See epidote and piedmontite. — Manganese garnet, spessartite. See garnet[1]. — Manganese spar, rhodonite. — Red manganese, a mineral usually of a rose-red color; rhodochrosite. — Red oxid of manganese, Mn_3O_4, a compound of manganese and oxygen which may be formed by exposing the peroxid or sesquioxid to a white heat. It occurs native as hausmannite. — White manganese, an ore of manganese; manganese carbonate.

manganese-glaze (mang-gạ-nēs′ glāz), n. A dark-gray or jet-black glaze, the color of which is given by manganese.

manganesian (mang-gạ-nē′si-ạn), a. [< manganese + -ian.] Pertaining to manganese; consisting of manganese; containing manganese, or characterized by its presence.

manganesic (mang-gạ-nē′sik), a. [< manganese + -ic.] Same as manganic.

manganesium (mang-gạ-nē′si-um), n. [NL.: see manganese.] Same as manganese. [Rare.]

manganetic (mang-gạ-net′ik), a. [< mangan(ese) + -etic, as in magnetic.] Same as manganiferous.

manganhedenbergite (mang-gan-hed′en-bėr-gīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + hedenbergite.] A variety of hedenbergite containing a relatively large amount of manganese, found in Sweden.

manganic (mang-gan′ik), a. [< mangan(ese) + -ic.] Containing manganese: in chemistry, specifically applied to compounds in which each manganese atom is apparently quadrivalent. Also manganesic. — Manganic acid, H_2MnO_4, an acid which is not known in the free state. Manganates of the alkalis are formed when manganese dioxid is heated with an alkali carbonate or nitrate. They have a green color, and readily decompose, forming permanganate and manganese dioxid. The crude alkali manganate was formerly called chameleon mineral from the property which its solution has of passing rapidly through several shades of color, occasioned by changes in its state of oxidation. Manganic oxid, Mn_2O_3, or manganese sesquioxid, is the mineral braunite.

manganiferous (mang-gạ-nif′e-rus), a. [< NL. manganium + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] Containing or carrying manganese: as, a manganiferous garnet. Also manganetic.

> These higher manganiferous irons show little or no magnetic action.
> C. R. Alder Wright, Encyc. Brit., XIII. 350.

★manganite (mang′gạ-nīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + -ite[2].] A hydrated oxid of manganese occurring in orthorhombic crystals of a steel-gray or iron-black color and brilliant luster, also in masses having a columnar structure. It is often altered, by loss of water, to pyrolusite. Also called gray manganese ore.

manganium (mang-gā′ni-um), n. [NL., short for manganesium.] Same as manganese.

manganocalcite (mang″gạ-nọ-kal′sīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + calcite.] A variety of calcite containing manganese carbonate.

manganomagnetite (mang″gạ-nọ-mag′ne-tīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + magnetite.] A variety of magnetite containing considerable manganese.

manganophyllite (mang″gạ-nọ-fil′īt), n. [< mangan(ese) + Gr. φύλλον, leaf, + -ite[2].] A manganiferous mica occurring in thin reddish scales at several localities in Sweden.

manganosiderite (mang″gạ-nọ-sid′e-rīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + siderite.] A carbonate of manganese and iron, intermediate between rhodochrosite and siderite.

manganosite (mang-gạ-nō′sīt), n. [< mangan(ese) + -ose (?) + -ite[2].] Manganese protoxid, a mineral occurring in regular octahedrons of an emerald-green color, found at several localities in Sweden.

manganostibiite (mang″gạ-nọ-stib′i-īt), n. [< mangan(ese) + stibi(um) + -ite[2].] An antimoniate of manganese, occurring in black embedded grains at Nordmark in Sweden.

manganotantalite (mang″gạ-nọ-tan′tạ-līt), n. [< mangan(ese) + tantalite.] A variety of tantalite in which the iron is largely replaced by manganese. The manganotantalite first known was from the Ural, and had the crystalline form of ordinary columbite. A massive manganesian tantalite from Sweden is distinguished as mangantantalite.

★manganous (mang′gạ-nus), a. [< mangan(ese) + -ous.] Containing manganese: in chemistry, specifically applied to compounds in which each manganese atom is regarded as having a quantivalence (apparently) of two. Compare manganic.

By exposing the manganous oxide to a strong current of air, it takes up another atom of oxygen.
Science, XIII. 261.

mangcorn (mang'kôrn), n. [Also mong-corn, mung-corn, muncorn, < ME. mangcorn*, mongcorn (= G. mangkorn); < mang[1], mong[1], + corn[1].] A mixture of wheat and rye and other species of grain; a crop of several species of grain grown together. [Eng.]

mange[1]†, v. t. [< ME. mangen, maungen, < OF. mangier, F. manger = Sp. Pg. manjar = It. mangiare, eat, < L. manducare, chew, LL. eat, devour: see manducate. Cf. manch[1], maunch[1], mounch, munch, other forms of the same word.] To eat.

ȝe haue manged [var. maunged] ouere muche, that maketh ȝow be syke. Piers Plowman (C), ix. 272.

★mange[2] (mānj), n. [Early mod. E. mangy reduced to mange (whence the adj. mangy, < mange[2] + -y[1]), < OF. mangeue, mangue, manjue, menjue, itch, also eating, voracity, also what is eaten, food eaten (= Pg. manjua, food), < ML. manducata*, f., manducatus, m., what is eaten (cf. OF. mangeison, mangeson, also demangeison, F. démangeaison, itch), < L. manducare, chew, LL. eat, devour (> OF. manger, eat): see mange[1]. Cf. mangy, n.] A skin-disease or cutaneous affection of brutes, as the dog, horse, cattle, etc., resembling the itch, and caused by the presence in the skin of various acarines, especially the mange-mite. The term is loosely extended to some similar affections, whether or not of parasitic origin.

mange-insect (mānj'in″sekt), n. Same as mange-mite.

Mangelia (man-jē'li-ạ), n. See Mangilia.

mangel-wurzel (mang'gl-wėr″zl), n. [< G. mangelwurzel, prop. mangoldwurzel, 'beet-root,' < mangold, MHG. mangolt, beet (origin uncertain; > It. manigoldo = Slav. malgot), + wurzel, MHG. wurzel, OHG. wurzala (= D. wortel, root), < wurz, a plant, MHG. also root, = E. wort: see wort[1].] A variety of beet, Beta vulgaris, producing a larger and coarser root than the garden-beet, which is extensively cultivated as food for cattle.

mange-mite (mānj'mīt), n. A mite whose presence causes the mange, as Demodex folliculorum; any one of the Demodicidæ.

manger (mān'jėr), n. [< ME. mangeoure*, manjowre, manjure, manjore, < OF. mangeoire, mangeure, manjure, maingeure, F. mangeoire (= Pg. manjadoira), < ML. manducatoria* (cf. equiv. manducarium, a bag for oats, a horse's nose-bag), a manger, lit. an eating-place, < L. manducare, chew, eat, > OF. mangier, F. manger, eat: see mange[1].] 1. A trough or box in which is laid for horses or cattle such food as oats, bran, roots, or the like (hay being generally placed in a rack above the manger); the receptacle from which horses or cattle eat in a stable or cowhouse.

And she . . . laid him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn. Luke ii. 7.

A churlish cur got into a manger, and there lay growling to keep the horses from their provender.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. Naut., a small space at the forward end of the deck, divided off by a combing (called the manger-board), just back of the hawse-holes, to prevent the water which enters the latter from flowing aft on the deck.—Dog in the manger. See dog.—Living at heck and manger. See heck[1].

manger-board (mān'jėr-bōrd), n. A board or bulkhead on a ship's deck that separates the manger from the after part of the deck.

mangering†, n. [Cf. mong[1].] Uncertainty; perplexity.

The simple people might be brought in a mangering of their faith, and stand in doubt whom they might believe.
Philpot, Works, p. 315. (Halliwell.) mangery†, n. [ME., also mangerie, maungerie, < OF. mangerie, eating, feasting, < manger, eat: see mange[1].] The act of eating; a feast; food.

Al the whil that Gamelyn heeld his mangerye.
Tale of Gamelyn, l. 345.

Mangifera (man-jif'ę-rạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < mango + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Anacardiaceæ, the cashew family, and type of the tribe Mangifereæ, having the ovule ascending above the base of the cell, and the sepals and petals not increasing after the flower has expanded. They are tropical trees with simple, entire, coriaceous leaves, and polygamodiœcious flowers, which are small, pinkish or yellowish, and grow in much-branched panicles. The fruit is a fleshy drupe, fibrous within, and usually with more or less of a turpentine flavor. There are about 27 species, natives of tropical Asia.

Flowering Branch of Mango-tree (Mangifera Indica).
a, a flower; b, part of the inflorescence; c, the pistil; d, the fruit; e, the seed.

The mango, M. Indica, grows abundantly in India, and is cultivated in many other tropical countries for its edible fruits, which are very highly esteemed. There are a great many varieties, differing in the flavor, size, and shape of the fruit. The unripe fruits are much used in India in conserves and pickles, in which latter state they are frequently exported; the ripe fruits, also, are much eaten. Various parts of the tree are used in medicine.

Mangifereæ (man-ji-fē'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1883), < Mangifera + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Anacardiaceæ, the cashew family, embracing 8 genera, of which Mangifera is the type, and about 79 species, all natives of the tropics. The tribe is characterized by simple leaves, and by the ovule being suspended from a funiculus that rises from the base of the cell.

Mangilia (man-jil'i-ạ), n. [NL. (Lovén, 1846), orig. Mangelia (Risso, 1826); also Manzelia (Audouin, 1827); from the name of Mangili, an Italian naturalist.] The typical genus of Mangiliinæ.

Mangilia taeniata.

Mangiliinæ (man-jil-i-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mangilia + -inæ.] A subfamily of pleurotomoid gastropods, typified by the genus Mangilia, and characterized by absence of an operculum.

mangily† (mān'ji-li), adv. In a mangy or foul manner; meanly. [Rare.]

Oh, this sounds mangily, Poorly, and scurvily, in a soldier's mouth.
Fletcher (and another), False One, ii. 3. manginess (mān'ji-nes), n. The condition of being mangy; scabbiness; infection with the mange.

mangle[1] (mang'gl), v. t.; pret. and pp. mangled, ppr. mangling. [Early mod. E. also mangil; < ME. mangelen, as if for mankelen*, freq. of manken, mutilate; mixed with ML. mangulare for manculare*, mangle; cf. D. OF. mangonner, mangle. Cf. mangelen, OHG. mangolōn, mankolōn, MHG. mangelen, G. mangeln, Dan. mangle, be wanting, lack, freq. of OHG. mangōn, mengen, be wanting, lack: see mank[1]. The relations of these forms are somewhat uncertain.] 1. To cut and slash or tear at random; wound jaggedly or by numerous cuts; hack; lacerate; disfigure by cutting, hacking, tearing, or crushing: applied chiefly to the cutting of flesh.

The cristin neuer cessed to kille and to sle, and mangeled alle that thei myght take.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 445.

I mangle a thing, I disfygure it with cuttyng of it in peces or without order. Je mangonne . . . and je mutille. You have mangylled this meate horrybly, it is nat to sette afore no honest men (nul homme de bien) nowe.
Palsgrave, quoted in Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), ii. 99.

Unless thou give me crowns, brave crowns;
Or mangled shalt thou be by this my sword.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 4. 41.

2. Figuratively, to destroy the symmetry or completeness of; mutilate; mar through ignorance, bungling, or malice.

Your dishonour
Mangles true judgement, and bereaves the state
Of that integrity which should become 't.
Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 158.

The pagans paint him and mangle him after a thousand fashions. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 301.

The organ-part was thoroughly mangled.
The Athenæum, Feb. 25, 1882.

★=Syn. Maim, etc. See mutilate.

mangle[2] (mang'gl), n. [< D. mangel = MLG. mangel- (in comp.) = G. mangel, mandel = Sw. mangel = Dan. mangle- (in comp.) (cf. Pol. magiel = Bohem. magl = Little Russ. mahel = Lith. mangalis = Hung. mangorlō, < G.), a mangle, dim. (due perhaps in part to the OF. mangonel, > E. mangonel) of a form represented by G. mange, a mangle, MHG. mange, a machine for smoothing linen, a war-engine, = Icel. mangi, a mangonel, = It. mangano, a machine for smoothing linen, a war-engine, < ML. mangonum, mangona, mango(n-), a war-engine for throwing stones, etc., < Gr. μάγγανον, a war-engine for throwing stones, the axis of a pulley, a bolt, a hunting-net, etc., also a means of charming or bewitching (a philter, drug, etc.). Cf. mangonel, mangonize.] A machine for smoothing fabrics or household articles of linen or cotton, as sheets, tablecloths, napkins, and towels. In the older form an oblong rectangular wooden chest resting upon two cylinders and loaded with stones was moved backward and forward by means of a wheel and pinion, the rollers being thus made to pass over and press the articles spread on a polished table underneath. The modern mangle is essentially a calendering-machine (acting like a clothes-wringer), often operated by steam or other power. The power-machine employs a pair of hollow rolls heated internally by steam or gas-flames.—Mangle worker, one who works a mangle, specifically in finishing textile fabrics.

mangle[2] (mang'gl), v. t.; pret. and pp. mangled, ppr. mangling. [= D. MLG. mangelen = G. mangeln = Sw. mangla = Dan. mangle, mangle; from the noun.] To smooth with a mangle; calender.

mangle-bark (mang'gl-bärk), n. [< NL. mangle (see mangrove) + bark[2].] Same as mangrove-bark.

Mangle bark is principally used in tanning leather.
U. S. Cons. Rep., No. lix. (1885), p. 268.

mangler[1] (mang'glėr), n. [< mangle[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who mangles or tears in cutting; one who mars, mutilates, or disfigures.

Coarse manglers of the human face divine, Paint on. Tickell, To Sir Godfrey Kneller.

2. A machine for chopping meat for cooking; a meat-chopper or -masticator.

mangler[2] (mang'glėr), n. [= D. mangelaar = Sw. manglare; as mangle[2] + -er[1].] One who uses a mangle.

mangle-rack (mang'gl-rak), n. A rack having teeth on opposite sides, engaged by a pinion which meshes with the opposite sides alternately. The continuous rotatory motion of the pinion is by this device converted into a reciprocating motion, as in some forms of clothes-mangle. E. H. Knight.

mangle-wheel (mang'gl-hwēl), n. A wheel so constructed that a reciprocating rotatory motion is communicated to it by a pinion which rotates continuously.

mango (mang'gō), n.; pl. mangos or mangoes. [= F. mangue = Sp. mango, < Pg. manga, < Malay manggā, < Tamil māngāy, mānkāy, the mango (fruit), < mān (māmaram), the tree, + kāy, fruit.] 1. The slightly acid fruit of the mango-tree, oblong in shape and containing a large fiber-coated seed. See Mangifera.

The mango is certainly the king of fruit. Its flavour is a combination of apricot and pineapple.
Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. xiv.

2. The tree that produces mangos.

Sheltered by a drooping mango, whose rich clusters of purple and orange fruit hung in tempting proximity to lips and hands. Lady Brassey, Voyage of Sunbeam, I. xiv.

3. A small green melon pickled in imitation of pickled mangos.—4. A certain humming-bird, Lampornis mango.—Mango-ginger. See Curcuma, 2, and ginger[1].—Mountain mango, Clusia flava of Jamaica.

mango-bird (mang'gō-bėrd), n. A kind of Indian oriole, Oriolus kundoo (Sykes), of a yellow color, closely related to the common oriole of Europe.

The mango-bird glances through the groves, and in the early morning announces his beautiful but unwelcome presence with his merle-melody.
P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 55.

★mango-fish (mang'gō-fish), n. A fish, Polynemus paradiseus, of a golden color, with free pectoral rays, of which the upper three are about twice as long as the entire fish; the tupsee. It has no air-bladder, rarely exceeds 9 inches in length, and inhabits the Bay of Bengal to the Malay archipelago, entering rivers in April and May to spawn. Its flesh is highly esteemed. See cut under Polynemus.

mango-hummer (mang'gō-hum″ėr), n. Same as mango, 4.

mangold, mangold-wurzel (mang'gōld, -wėr″zl), n. Same as mangel-wurzel.

mangona† (mang'gō-nạ), n. [ML., also mangana, manganum: see mangonel, mangle[2].] A military engine for throwing stones, darts, etc. See mangonel.

mangonel† (mang'gō-nel), n. [Also manganel; < ME. mangonel, manganel, mangunel, magnel, magnal, < OF. mangonel, mangoneal, F. mangonneau = Pr. manganel = It. manganella, < ML. mangonellus, a mangonel, dim. of mangonum, mangona, an engine for throwing stones: see mangle[2].] A military engine formerly used for throwing stones, etc.

Mangonel. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. de l'Architecture.")

Arbalist, manganel, and catapult. Browning, Sordello.

mangonism† (mang'gō-nizm), n. [< mangon(ize) + -ism.] 1. The art of setting off worthless or poor things to advantage.—2. The production of artificial forms in plants.

Let gentlemen and ladies who are curious trust little by mangonisme, insuccations, or medicine, to alter the species, or indeed the forms and shapes of flowers considerably. Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, March.

mangonist† (mang'gō-nist), n. [< mangon(ize) + -ist.] 1. One who mangonizes.

The mangonist doth feed and graith his horse.
Money Masters all Things (1698), p. 77. (Encyc. Dict.)

2. A strumpet.

One who sels humane flesh—a mangonist!
Marston, Dutch Courtezan, i. 1.

mangonize† (mang'gō-nīz), v. t. [< L. mangonizare, furbish up for sale, < mango(n-), a dealer in slaves or wares who furbishes them up for sale, a furbisher, polisher, < Gr. μάγγανον, a means of charming or bewitching (or deceiving): see mangle[2].] 1. To polish or furbish up in order to set off to advantage.

Hist. What will you ask for them a week, captain?
Tuc. No, you mangonizing slave, I will not part from them.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iii. 1.

2. To fatten, as slaves, for sale.

mangoose, n. See mongoos.

mangostan (mang'gō-stan), n. See mangosteen.

mangosteen (mang'gō-stēn), n. [Also mangostan; = F. mangoustan (the tree), mangouste (the fruit), < Malay mangustan, mangis.] The important tropical fruit-tree Garcinia Mangostana; also, its product. Occasionally written mangostine.—Wild mangosteen, Diospyros peregrina, a dense tree with astringent fruit, common in the East Indies.

mango-tree (mang'gō-trē), n. Mangifera Indica. See Mangifera and mango.

★mangrove (mang'grōv), n. [Formerly also mangrowe (1670); appar. an altered form, simulating E. grove, of mango*, or some similar form (cf. F. manglier, Sp. mangle, NL. mangle, mangrove) of Malay manggi-manggi, mangrove.]

1. A tree of the genus Rhizophora: the American mangrove is R. Mangle, that of the old world is R. mucronata. They are usually low trees of most singular habit, remarkable for a copious development of adventitious roots, which arch out from the lower part of the trunk, and at length descend from the branches; it is peculiar also in that its seed germinates in the fruit, sending down its radicle into the mud, sometimes a distance of several feet, before detachment from the parent. By these means the mangrove spreads thickly over the tidal mud, forming impenetrable and highly malarial bogs, hundreds of miles in length. The wood is valuable for fuel, for piles, etc., and is susceptible of a beautiful polish. The astringent bark is useful in medicine and for tanning. The fruit is of a dry and coriaceous texture. See cut in preceding column.

2. Another plant of similar habit, especially a plant of the genus Avicennia. They are littoral trees, widely diffused in the tropics, throwing out a tangled mass of arching roots above ground, and sending up abundant asparagus-like shoots from the underground roots. The seed also germinates as it ripens. A. officinalis, called white mangrove, extends from tropical Asia and east Africa to Australia and New Zealand, the manawa of the Maoris, mistakenly reported to yield an aromatic gum. A. nitida of tropical America and Africa is the black or olive mangrove. See blackwood, 3.

3. In zoöl., the mango-fish.—Red mangrove, a Guiana form or name of the common mangrove.—White mangrove. See def. 2; also, the white buttonwood (which see).—Zaragoza mangrove, Conocarpus erecta. See buttonwood, 1.

mangrove-bark (mang'grōv-bärk), n. The bark of the common mangrove, of Avicennia officinalis, and of several similar East Indian trees, valuable for tanning. Also mangle-bark.

mangrove-cuckoo (mang'grōv-kůk″ō), n. An American tree-cuckoo, Coccyzus seniculus or C. minor, found in Florida and some of the West Indian islands: so called from frequenting mangroves. It resembles the common C. americanus, and is of about the same size, but the under parts are pale orange-brown instead of white, and the auriculars are dusky. See Coccyzinæ.

mangrove-hen (mang'grōv-hen), n. The common salt-water marsh-hen or clapper-rail, Rallus longirostris or R. crepitans. [West Indies.]

mangrove-snapper (mang'grōv-snap″ėr), n. The gray snapper, Lutianus griseus, a common fish of the West Indies and north to Virginia. It is grayish-green in color and has strong teeth, biting eagerly at a baited hook. It lurks under the mangroves of the Florida coast, hence the name. See snapper.

mangue (mang), n. [F.; perh. an abbr. of mangouste, mongoose.] A viverrine quadruped of Africa, Crossarchus obscurus, about Mangue (Crossarchus obscurus).

19 inches long, of a nearly uniform dark-brown color, paler on the head, the feet blackish, and the snout long and slender.

Mangusta (mang-gus'tạ), n. [NL. (Cuvier), after F. mangouste: see mongoose.] A generic name of ichneumons or mongooses: same as Herpestes.

mangy† (mān'ji), n. See mange[2], n.

The dog whose mangy eats away his haire.
Stapylton, Juvenal, viii. 42. (Encyc. Dict.)

mangy (mān'ji), a. [< mange[2], n., + -y[1].] Infected with the mange; scabby; hence, untidily rough or shaggy, as if from mange.

Away, thou issue of a mangy dog!
Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 371.

I remember her a mangy little urchin picking weeds in the garden. Thackeray.

manhaden, n. See menhaden.

manhandle (man'han″dl), v. t.; pret. and pp. manhandled, ppr. manhandling. Naut., to move by force of men, without levers or tackles; hence, to handle roughly; pull and push about, as a person, in anger or in sport.

In two minutes [they] were so mauled and manhandled that it was reported aft. The Century, XXXI. 905.

man-hater (man'hā″tėr), n. 1. One who hates mankind; a misanthrope.

What will they do then, in the name of God and Saints, what will these man-haters yet with more despight and mischief do? Milton, Church-Government, ii., Con.

2. One who hates the male sex.

Rousseau, of Geneva, a professed man-hater, or, more properly speaking, a philosopher enraged with more than half of mankind. Goldsmith, Polite Learning, viii.

manhead† (man'hed), n. [Early mod. E. manhed; < ME. manhede = MLG. manheit = OHG. manaheit, MHG. manheit, G. mannheit; < man + -head.] 1. The state of being human; human nature; humanity.

The high Physicion, our Blessed Sauiour Christ, whose holy Manhed God ordeined for our necessitie.
Sir T. More, Cumfort against Tribulation.

2. Manhood; virility.

Thou mayst, syn thou hast wysdom and manhede,
Assemblen al the folk of oure kynrede.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 427.

Sone, y schal thee schewe—now take hede—
And of suche maners thee declare
Bi whiche thou schalt come to manhede,
To wordli worschip, and to weelfare.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 34.

manheim (man'hīm), n. A brass alloy resembling gold. See Mannheim gold, under gold.

manhole (man'hōl), n. 1. A hole through which a man may enter a sewer, drain, cesspool, or the like, for cleaning or repairing; in steam-boilers, hot-water tanks, keirs, etc., a hole formed in the shell, through which a man may enter to the interior for cleaning, inspection, or repairs In the latter cases the hole is provided with a cover by which it may be stopped steam-tight or water-tight, the cover being usually fitted to the inside, and the hole made elliptical so that the cover can be easily inserted; the pressure of the steam or water assists in holding the cover to its seat.

2. In coal-mining: (a) An excavation or refuge-hole made in the side of an underground engine-plane or horse-road. [Eng.] (b) A small and generally short passage used for the ingress and egress of the miners. [Pennsylvania anthracite region.] (c) A niche cut in the side of a railroad-tunnel as a refuge-hole.

manhood (man'hůd), n. [< ME. manhode (also manhede: see manhead[1]); < man + -hood.] 1. The state of being man, or of belonging to the human race, as distinguished from higher or lower orders of existence.

Equal to the Father as touching his godhead, and inferior to the Father as touching his manhood.
Athanasian Creed, [English] Book of Common Prayer.

Therefore thy humiliation shall exalt
With thee thy manhood also to this throne.
Milton, P. L., iii. 314.

2. The state of being a man, as distinguished from a woman or a boy; virility.

To some shade,
And fit you to your manhood.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 4. 195.

His starry helm unbuckled show'd him prime
In manhood where youth ended.
Milton, P. L., xi. 246.

3. The quality of being a man or manly; manliness; possession of masculine qualities, as courage, fortitude, resolution, honor, etc.

I am ashamed
That thou hast power to shake my manhood thus.
Shak., Lear, i. 4. 319.

Peace hath higher test of manhood
Than battle ever knew.
Whittier, The Hero.

Manhood suffrage. See suffrage. = Syn. 3. Bravery, firmness, stanchness.

Branch of Mangrove (Rhizophora mucronata), with leaves and fruit. a, flowers; b, a flower laid open, the pistil removed; c, the pistil; d, a trichoblast in the bark, highly magnified.

★mania (mā'ni-ạ), n. [Early mod. E. manie (see manie), < ME. manie, < OF. manie, F. manie = Sp. manía = Pg. It. mania; < L. mania, madness (a disease of cattle), ML. NL. insanity, < Gr. μανία, madness, frenzy, < μαίνεσθαι, rage, be mad; akin to μένος, mind, μῆνις, wrath, etc.: see mind[1].] 1. Any form or phase of insanity with exaltation of spirits and rapidity of mental action; specifically, a psychoneurosis with these as the fundamental features. In a mania in this strict sense there may be delusions, but they fail of the systematized character of those of paranœa. Delusions and hallucinations may also be present. The attack may last for days, or months, or years. The prognosis is not very unfavorable. The cases issue in recovery, in death by exhaustion and intercurrent disease, and a considerable proportion in permanent imbecility.

2. An eager, uncontrolled, or uncontrollable desire: as, a mania for drink; in colloquial use, a "rage" or craze for something: as, a mania for first editions.

In the end of the 12th or beginning of the 13th century, the mania for painted glass had seized on the French architects, and all architectural propriety was sacrificed to this mode of decoration. J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 529

Mania a potu, madness from drinking; delirium tremens. —Mania gravis. Same as Bell's disease (which see, under disease).—Mania transitoria, insanity coming on suddenly in individuals previously sane, and not the delirium of an epileptic attack, which it resembles. =Syn. 1. Insanity, Lunacy, etc. See insanity.

maniable† (man'i-ạ-bl), a. [< F. maniable, < manier, handle, manage, < main, < L. manus, the hand: see *main*³, manage.] Manageable; tractable; docile.

Learning doth make the minds of men gentle, generous, maniable, and pliant to government.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 23.

maniac (mā'ni-ak), a. and n. [= F. maniaque = Sp. maniaco = Pg. It. maniaco, < NL. maniacus, < L. mania, < Gr. μανία, madness: see mania.] I. a. Raving with madness; mad or crazy; insane.

II. n. One who raves with madness; a madman.

All their symptoms agree with those of epileptics and maniacs, who fancied they had evil spirits within them.
Farmer, Demoniacs of the New Testament, i. 8.

maniacal (mā-nī'a-kạl), a. [< maniac + -al.] Pertaining to madness; marked by or manifesting mania; insane; mad: as, a maniacal tendency; maniacal ravings.

Epilepsis and maniacal lunacies usually conform to the age of the moon. N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra.

manicate (man'i-kāt), a. [< L. manicatus, sleeved: see *manch*².] In bot., covered with hairs or pubescence so dense and interwoven into a mass that they form a tissue which can be easily stripped off.

Manichæism, n. See Manicheism.

Manichean, Manichæan (man-i-kē'an), a. and n. [= F. Manichéen; as Manichee + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Manicheans.

As dreadful as the Manichean god,
Adored through fear, strong only to destroy.
Cowper, Task, v. 444.

II. n. One of a religious body, adherents of Mani, Manes, or Manichæus, a native of Persia or some neighboring country, in the third century. Its doctrines and features were derived from Gnostic, Buddhistic, Zoroastrian, and various other sources. These it attempted to combine with Christianity, and it is generally classed among Gnostic sects. Its theology was dualistic, representing the conflict between light and darkness, and including belief in the inherent evil of matter. Its morality was professedly ascetic, but profligacy of life and cruel or immoral ceremonial were generally attributed to it in both its earlier and its later forms. It had an organized priesthood, and recognized a distinction between its esoteric class (the "elect" or "perfect") and the "hearers." It originated in Persia, but soon extended into the Roman empire, and existed as late as the seventh century. The Paulicians, Albigenses, Catharists, etc., developed it into new forms, retaining many of its features, and hence were styled "New Manicheans." The title Manichean, or New Manichean, was an epithet used opprobriously in the controversies of the middle ages.

Manichee (man'i-kē), n. [= Sp. Maniqueo = Pg. Manicheo, < LL. Manichæus, < LGr. Μανιχαῖος, usually in pl. Μανιχαῖοι, L. Manichæi, one of the sect so called, adj. Μανιχαϊκός, < Gr. Μανιχαῖος, LL. Manichæus, otherwise called Μάνης, LL. Manes, < Pers. Mani, the founder.] Same as Manichean.

If I trip him just a-dying,
Sure of heaven as sure can be,
Spin him round and send him flying Off to hell a Manichee?
Browning, Soliloquy of the Spanish Cloister.

Manicheism, Manichæism (man'i-kē-izm), n. [= F. Manichéisme = Sp. Maniqueísmo = Pg. Manicheismo; as Manichee + -ism.] The religious system taught by or derived from the teachings of Manichæus; Manichean doctrine.

Manicheist (man'i-kē-ist), n. [< Manichee + -ist.] Same as Manichean.

manichord (man'i-kôrd), n. [< F. manichordion, OF. manicordon = It. monocordo, an instrument so named, orig. with one string, < Gr. μονόχορδος, with one string: see monochord, of which manichord is thus ult. an erroneous form.] A clarichord. Also called dumb spinet.

manicle†, n. An obsolete but historically more correct form of manacle.

manicon† (man'i-kon), n. [NL., < L. manicon, a plant the juice of which was supposed to produce madness, < Gr. μανικόν, neut. of μανικός, belonging to madness, mad, < μανία, madness: see mania.] A kind of nightshade, probably Atropa Belladonna.

Bewitch hermetic men to run
Stark staring mad with manicon.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 321.

manicure (man'i-kūr), n. [< L. manus, hand, + cura, care.] 1. The surgical care of the hands and nails.—2. One who makes a business of trimming and polishing the nails, removing blemishes from the hands, etc.

manicure (man'i-kūr), v.; pret. and pp. manicured, ppr. manicuring. [< manicure, n.] I. trans. To care for (the hands and nails). [Recent.]

The daughter's [hands] shall trifle with books and music, shall be soft and manicured and daintily gloved.
The Century, XXXVIII. 873.

II. intrans. To perform the work of a manicure. [Recent.]

Manidæ (man'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Manis + -idæ.] A family of squamate edentates, the sole representative of the suborder Squamata of the order Bruta, peculiar to tropical Asia and Africa; the pangolins or scaly ant-eaters. The form is elongate, without apparent distinction of neck and tail. The whole aspect resembles that of a lizard, an appearance heightened by the remarkable large, flat, horny, overlapping scales which cover the upper parts in continuous series. The under parts are hairy; teeth are wanting; the hind feet are plantigrade and five-toed, and the fore feet are also pentadactyl, but the digits are so shaped that the animal walks on its knuckles. The placentation is diffuse and non-deciduate. The family includes 6 or 8 species, referable to 3 genera, Manis, Pholidotus, and Smutsia. See cut under pangolin. Also Manina, and wrongly Manididæ.

manie†, n. [Early mod. E., < ME. manie, manye, < OF. manie, < L. mania, madness: see mania, the present form of the word.] Madness; mania.

Manye
Engendred of humour malencolyk.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 516.

So this fell Fury, for fore-runners, sends Manie and Phrenzie to suborne her frends.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Furies.

★manifest (man'i-fest), a. and n. [= F. manifeste = Sp. manifiesto = Pg. It. manifesto, < L. manifestus, evident, clear, plain, palpable; prob. orig. 'struck by the hand' (hence 'at hand,' 'palpable'), < manus, the hand, + festus,* for fedtus,* fendtus,* pp. of fendere,* strike: see *fend*¹, defend, offend.] I. a. That may be readily perceived by the eye or the understanding; open to view or to comprehension; plain; obvious; apparent.

Pericles, whose wordes are manifeste and playne,
From swerynge admonisheth thee to obstaine.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 350.

God was manifest in the flesh. 1 Tim. iii. 16.

Ay, and make 't manifest where she has lived.
Shak., W. T., v. 3. 114.

Calisto there stood manifest of shame.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 623.

Manifest destiny. See destiny.—Manifest hypermetropia. See hypermetropia.—Manifest polysyllogism, a series of syllogisms each set forth in full.—Manifest quality, in philos., a quality intelligible in its own nature or as it exists in the thing itself. =Syn. Clear, Plain, Evident, Manifest, Obvious, patent, palpable, unmistakable, conspicuous. The first five words agree in representing the object as though viewed with the eye. What is clear can be seen without dimness; what is plain can be seen by any one at the first glance, without search or study. Evident suggests something more of a mental process, but no difficulty in seeing that the thing is true. Manifest is a degree stronger than evident, the mind getting the truth as by an intuition. Obvious by derivation applies to that which lies so directly in our way that we cannot help coming upon it and seeing it; that which is obvious needs no pointing out or explaining. We speak of a clear case of self-deception; a duty that is plain; an evident mistake; a manifest misunderstanding; an obvious inference, not needing to be actually put into words.

II. n. 1†. A public declaration; an open statement; a manifesto.

But you authentic witnesses I bring,
Before the gods and your ungrateful king,
Of this my manifest. Dryden, Iliad, i. 473.

2. A document, signed by the master of a vessel, containing a list of all the packages or separate items of freight on board, with their distinguishing marks, numbers, descriptions, destination, etc., for the information and use of the custom-house officers. By the United States Revised Statutes, § 2807, it is required to contain also a designation of the ports of lading and of destination, a description of the vessel, and the designation of its port, its owners and master, the names of consignees, of passengers, with a list of their baggage, and an account of the sea-stores remaining.

manifest (man'i-fest), v. t. [< F. manifester = Sp. Pg. manifestar = It. manifestare, < L. manifestare, make plain, < manifestus, evident, plain: see manifest, a.] To disclose to the eye or to the understanding; show plainly; put beyond doubt or question; display; exhibit.

There is nothing hid which shall not be manifested.
Mark iv. 22.

Therefore, for Coriolanus neither to care whether they love or hate him manifests the true knowledge he has in their disposition. Shak., Cor., ii. 2. 14.

They sente a booke of exceptions against his accounts, in such things as they could manifest.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 304.

manifestable (man'i-fes-tạ-bl), a. [< manifest, v., + -able.] Capable of being manifested or shown. Also, less properly, manifestible.

There is no other way then this that is manifestible either by Scripture, reason, or experience.
Dr. H. More, Def. of Moral Cabbala, iii.

manifestant (man-i-fes'tant), a. [< L. manifestan(t-)s, ppr. of manifestare, manifest: see manifest, v.] One who makes a manifestation or demonstration. [Rare.]

The manifestants paraded past the docks.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 407.

manifestation (man″i-fes-tā'shọn), n. [= OF. F. Pr. manifestation = Sp. manifestación = Pg. manifestação = It. manifestazione, < L. manifestatio(n-), < manifestare, make plain: see manifest.] 1. The act of manifesting or disclosing what is secret, unseen, or obscure; a making evident to the eye or to the understanding; the exhibition of something by clear evidence; display; revelation: as, the manifestation of God's power in creation.

The manifestation of his personal valour.
Raleigh, Hist. World, IV. vii. 2.

2. That in or by which something is manifested or made apparent or known.

Mind and matter are manifestations of the same power, the distinction being that in the one the real and in the other the ideal preponderates.
J. Watson, Schelling's Transcendental Idealism, p. 213.

manifestative (man-i-fes'tā-tiv), a. [< manifest + -ative.] Manifested; consisting in manifestation. [Rare.]

His essential glory could suffer no detriment, His manifestative did. Charnock, Works, IV. 5.

manifestedness (man'i-fes-ted-nes), n. The state of having been manifested, shown, or made clear. [Rare.]

manifester (man'i-fes-tėr), n. One who manifests. [Rare.]

manifestly (man'i-fest-li), adv. In a manifest manner; clearly; evidently; plainly.

Give me your hand; you are welcome to your country.
Now I remember plainly, manifestly,
As freshly as if yesterday I had seen him.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, ii. 1.

manifestness (man'i-fest-nes), n. The state or quality of being manifest; obviousness; plainness; clearness.

manifesto (man-i-fes'tō), n. [< It. manifesto = E. manifest.] A public declaration, as of a sovereign or government, or of any person or body of persons, making known certain intentions, or proclaiming certain opinions and motives in reference to some act or course of conduct done or contemplated; in general, a proclamation.

The Commissioners have made their dying speech in the shape & form of a manifesto & Proclamation.
George Washington, To Col. Sam'l Washington (N. A. Rev., [CXLIII. 482).

He put forth a manifesto, telling the people that it had been his constant care to govern them with justice and moderation. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., x.

Ostend Manifesto, in U. S. hist., a despatch drawn up in 1854 by three diplomatic representatives of the United States after a conference at Ostend in Belgium, urging that the United States should acquire Cuba.

manifesto (man-i-fes'tō), v. t. or i. [< manifesto, n.] To affect by a manifesto; issue manifestos or declarations. Davies. [Rare.]

I am to be manifestoed against, though no prince; for Miss Howe threatens to have the case published to the whole world. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, VIII. 261.

Serene Highnesses who sit there protocolling and manifestoing and consoling mankind.
Carlyle, French Rev., II. vi. 3.

★manifold (man'i-fōld), a. and n. [Also manyfold in lit. use; < ME. manifold, manyfold, manifald, monifald, etc., < AS. manigfeald, mænigfeald, monigfeald (= OS. managfald = OFries. manichfald = OHG. managfalt, manacfalt, MHG. manecvalt = Icel. margfaldr = Goth. managfalths; cf., with additional adj. suffix, D. menigvoudig, menigvuldig = MLG. mannichvoldich = Sw. mångfaldig = Dan. mangfoldig; also AS. manigfealdlīc = Icel. margfaldligr), < manig, many, + -feald, E. -fold.] I. a. 1. Of many kinds; numerous in kind or variety; varied; diverse.

O Lord, how manifold are thy works! Ps. civ. 24.

The Calamities and Confusions which the late Wars did bring upon us were many and manifold.
Howell, Letters, iv. 47.

For him it bore
Attractions manifold—and this he chose.
Wordsworth, Excursion, i.

2. Exhibiting or embracing many points, features, or characteristics; complicated in character; having many parts or relations: used with nouns in the singular number: as, the manifold wisdom or the manifold grace of God (Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. iv. 10); "the manifold use of friendship," Bacon.

With how manifold and strong a bond
The child was bound to the father.
Shak., Lear, ii. 1. 49.

Manifold fugue, a fugue with more than one subject.

II. n. 1. A complicated object or subject; that which consists of many and various parts; specifically, an aggregate of particulars or units; especially, in math., a multitude of objects connected by a system of relations; an ensemble. —2. In Kant's theory of knowledge, the total of the particulars furnished by sense before they are connected by the synthesis of the understanding; that which is in the sense and has not yet been in thought.

Then, and then only, do we say that we know an object, if we have produced synthetical unity in the manifold of intuition.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller.

He [Kant] . . . tells us in the Analytic that sense only presents to us a mere manifold, which requires to be bound together in the unity of a conception ere it can be apprehended as an object.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 228.

3. A copy or facsimile made by means of a manifold-writer, or by the use of carbon-paper in a type-writer, etc.—4. A tube, usually of cast metal, with one or more flanged or screw-threaded inlets and two or more flanged or screw-threaded outlets for pipe-connections, much used in pipe-fitting for steam-heating coils, or for cooling-coils in breweries, and in other cases where it is useful to convey steam, water, or air from a large pipe into several smaller ones. Also called T-branch and header.—Class of a manifold, in math., the multitude of an infinite manifold. A discretely infinite manifold is said to belong to the first class, and a continuously infinite manifold to the second class.—Condensed manifold. See condensed.—Derivative of a manifold of points. See derivative.

manifold (man'i-fōld), adv. [= OHG. managfalto (cf. D. menigvuldig); from the adj.] Many times; in multiplied number or quantity.

There is no man who hath left house, or parents, . . . who shall not receive manifold more. Luke xviii. 30.

manifold (man'i-fōld), v. t. [< ME. manifolden, < AS. gemænigfalden, gemonigfealdian (= OHG. managfaltōn, manacfaldan, MHG. manecvalten = Icel. margfalda = Sw. mångfaldiga; cf. MLG. mannichvoldigen); from the adj.] To make manifold; multiply; specifically, to multiply impressions of by a single operation, as a letter by means of a manifold-writer, or by the use of carbon-paper in a type-writer.

manifoldly (man'i-fōld-li), adv. [< ME. manifoldly*, < AS. manigfealdlice (= Icel. margfaldliga), < manigfeald, manifold: see manifold.] In a manifold manner; in many ways.

manifoldness (man'i-fōld-nes), n. [< ME. manifoldnes*, < AS. manigfealdness, < manigfeald, manifold: see manifold.] 1. The state of being manifold; variety; multiplicity.—2. In math.: (a) A manifold or ensemble; especially, a continuous quantity of any number of dimensions.

This wider conception of which space and time are particular varieties it has been proposed to denote by the term manifoldness. Whenever a general notion is susceptible of a variety of specializations, the aggregate of such specializations is called a manifoldness. Thus space is the aggregate of all points, and each point is a specialization of the general notion of position. F. W. Frankland.

(b) The number of different prime factors of a number.

The total number of distinct primes which divide a given number I call its manifoldness or multiplicity.
J. J. Sylvester, Nature, XXXVII. 152.

manifold-paper (man'i-fōld-pā″pėr), n. Carbonized paper used for duplicating a writing, or in a typewriting-machine.

manifold-writer (man'i-fōld-rī″tėr), n. A preparation of oiled paper interleaved with carbonized paper, which, when written on with a hard point, transfers the impressed carbon in the form of writing to two or more sheets.

maniform (man'i-fôrm), a. [< L. manus, the hand, + forma, form.] 1. Having the form of a hand; hand-shaped.—2. Having the two terminal joints opposed to each other, as the pedipalp of a scorpion; chelate. Kirby.

maniglion (ma-nil'yon), n. [< It. maniglione, a handle of a cannon, < maniglio, a bracelet: see manilio.] A handle of an early type of cannon, usually one of two handles cast with the gun. Compare dolphin, 5.

manihoc† (man'i-hok), n. Same as manioc.

Manihot (man'i-hot), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763), < Galibi manihoc.] 1. A genus of plants, of the tribe Manihoteæ. The calyx of the staminate flowers has imbricated lobes and is often colored, the stamens are 10 in number and have anthers attached at the back, and the styles are spreading. They are tall herbs or shrubs, with alternate leaves which are undivided or often palmately 3- to 7-lobed or -parted, and monœcious apetalous flowers, which are quite large and grow in terminal or axillary racemes. There are about 80 species, all natives of tropical and subtropical America; several of them, however, are largely cultivated elsewhere. The genus is of great importance for the food-products derived from the roots of several species, especially M. Manihot, the bitter cassava, and M. Aipi, the sweet cassava, which by some are regarded as varieties of one species. M. Glaziovii furnishes Brazilian or Ceara india-rubber. See arrowroot, cassava, manioc, and tapioca.

2. [l. c.] Same as manioc.

manikia, n. Plural of manikion.

manikin, manakin (man'i-kin, man'a-kin), n. and a. [Also mannikin, in def. 3 sometimes manequin; < OF. manequin, F. mannequin = Sp. maniquí, a puppet, manikin; < MD. manneken (= G. männchen), a little man, < man, = E. man, + dim. -ken, E. -kin. Cf. mankin[1]. The bird Pipra manacus was called manikin (G. bart-männchen) in allusion to the beard-like feathers on the chin.] I. n. 1. A little man; a dwarf; a pygmy.

Fab. This is a dear manakin to you, Sir Toby.
Sir To. I have been dear to him, lad, some two thousand strong, or so. Shak., T. N., iii. 2. 57.

Forth rush'd the madding mannikin to arms.
Beattie, Battles of the Pigmies and Cranes.

2. A model of the human body, used for showing the structure, form, and position of the various organs, limbs, muscles, etc., or adapted and used for practising bandaging or for performing certain obstetrical operations, as delivery with the forceps.—3. An artists' model of the human figure. See lay-figure and manequin.—4. A non-oscine passerine bird of the subfamily Piprinæ. Manikins are generally small, thick-set, and of brilliant plumage; with few exceptions, they are natives of the hottest parts of America. They feed on vegetable and animal substances, and are lively and active in their movements. The bearded manikin, Manacus manacus, is black, with the breast, neck, and tuft of feathers on the chin white. The species are numerous, and the sexes are diverse in color and often in form, the males of many having curiously shaped wings or tail. The name sometimes extends to all the Pipridæ, and to some members of the related family Cotingidæ. See cut under Manacus. [In this sense usually manakin, conformably with the New Latin Manacus.]

II. a. Like a manikin; artificial. [Rare.]

Boors, indeed; but they are live boors, and not manikin shepherds. D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days (Theocritus).

manikion (ma-nik'i-on), n.; pl. manikia (-ä). [MGr. μανίκιον, a sleeve: see epimanikion.] Same as epimanikion.

manil (ma-nil'), n. Same as manille[1].

manila, manilla[3] (mä-nil'ä), n. [< Manila (see def.).] 1. [cap.] A kind of cheroot manufactured in Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands.—2. A fibrous material obtained from the leaves of Musa textilis, the abaca or abaka, a plant that grows in the Philippine Islands. Excellent ropes and cables are made from it (its most common use); and its finer qualities are woven into fabrics suitable for wearing-apparel, sometimes of great beauty and cost. Also called Manila hemp. See Musa.

Manila copal, elemi, rope, etc. See copal, etc.

manilio (mä-nil'iō), n. [< It. maniglio, maniglia, a bracelet, a handle: see manille[1], maniglion.] Same as manilla[1].

Their arms and legs chained with manilios or voluntary bracelets. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 204.

manilla[1] (mä-nil'ä), n. [< Sp. manilla = Pg. manilha = It. maniglia, a bracelet, ring-money, < ML. manilia, a bracelet, < L. manus, hand: see main[3]. Cf. manille[1], manilio.] A piece of ring-money such as was until recent times used for barter on the Guinea coast of Africa. These pieces are of copper or iron, of fixed weight, and in the nineteenth century were manufactured in England for exportation to Africa.

A Manilla is a solid Piece of Gold, of two or three Ounces Weight, worn in a Ring round the Wrist.
Lockyer, Acc. Trade India, p. 276.

manilla[2] (mä-nil'ä), n. [See manille[2].] In the game of solo, the seven of trumps, the highest card but one.

manilla[3], n. See manila.

manille[1] (mä-nil'), n. [Also manil; < OF. manille, a bracelet, a handle, < It. maniglia = Sp. manilla, a bracelet: see manilla[1].] Same as manilio. Ash.

manille[2] (ma-nēl'), n. [< F. manille, < Sp. malilla, for manilla* = Pg. manilha, a game of cards, manille (as defined); appar. < mano, hand: cf. manilla[1].] The highest card but one in the games of omber and quadrille. It is the two of clubs or spades, or the seven of diamonds or hearts, according as one or other of these suits is trumps, the manille always being a trump. The card, in the form Manilio, is personified in the following lines:

Spadillio first, unconquerable lord!
Led off two captive trumps, and swept the board.
As many more Manillio forced to yield,
And march'd a victor from the verdant field.
Pope, R. of the L., iii. 51.

Manina (mā-nī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Manis + -ina[1].] Same as Manidæ.

maninose (man'i-nōz), n. [Also manninose, mannynose, manynose, nannynose, etc.; < Amer. Ind. mananosay.] The soft clam, Mya arenaria. [Maryland and Virginia.]

manioc (man'i-ok), n. [Also mandioc, manihoc, manihot, maniocca; = Sp. Pg. mandioca; Tupi mandioca, manioca; Guarani mandio.] The cassava-plant or its product. The manioc or cassava is a very important food-staple in tropical America. The tubers of Manihot Manihot, sometimes weighing forty pounds, must be grated to a pulp and submitted to pressure in order to remove a deleterious juice. Those of M. Aipi may be used as a vegetable like potatoes. An intoxicating drink (piwarrie) is prepared from manioc.

maniocca (man-i-ok'ä), n. See manioc.

maniple (man'i-pl), n. [< OF. maniple, F. manipule = Sp. manipulo = Pg. manipulo = It. manipulo, manipolo, < L. manipulus, a handful, a bundle; also (because, it is said, a bundle of hay was tied to the military standards), a number of soldiers belonging to the same standard, a company, < manus, the hand, + -pulus, akin to E. full[1]: see full[1].] 1. A handful. [Rare.]

I have seen him wait at court there with his maniples Of papers and petitions.
B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, i. 1.

Do thou pluck a maniple—that is, an handful—of the plant called Maidenhair, and make a syrup therewith as I have shewed thee. O. W. Holmes, Med. Essays, p. 282.

2. In Rom. antiq., a military company consisting normally of 120 men in three out of the four classes of infantry (velites, hastati, and principes), and of 60 men in the fourth (triarii), with two (first and second) centurions and a standard-bearer. Three maniples constituted a cohort.

The enemy were actually inside before the few maniples who were left there were able to collect and resist them.
Froude, Cæsar, p. 317.

Hence—3†. A company or any small body of soldiers.

The Rereward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, consisting of two thousand mingled Weapons, with two Wings of Horse-men, containing fifteen hundred, all of them cast into square Maniples. Baker, Chronicles, p. 232.

Fool! he sees not the firm root out of which we all grow though into branches; nor will beware until hee see our small divided maniples cutting through at every angle of his ill united and unwieldy brigade.
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 48.

4. In the Western Church, one of the eucharistic vestments, consisting of a short, narrow strip, similar in material, width, and color to the stole. It is marked with a cross and generally embroidered and fringed. The maniple is worn by prelates, priests, deacons, and subdeacons, hanging from the left sleeve of the alb, fastened near the wrist, or attached by strings, pins, or a button. It is assumed by the celebrant after the alb and girdle, and before the stole. A bishop assumes it at the Indulgentiam. In Anglican churches maniples are worn, as in the medieval church, three or four feet in length; in the Roman Catholic Church they are now much shorter. The maniple seems to have first come into use in the eighth century, and was originally a piece of white linen used as a handkerchief. Till the twelfth century and later it continued to be held in the hand. There is no corresponding vestment in the Eastern Church, though some writers have confounded the epimanikion with it. Other names formerly given to the maniple were fanon or phanon, mantile, manutergium, mappula or mappa, and sudarium.

maniplies, n. sing. and pl. See manyplies.

manipular (mā-nip'ū-lär), a. [= F. manipulaire = It. (obs.) manipulare, manipolare, < L. manipularis, of or belonging to a maniple or company, < manipulus, a handful, a military company: see maniple.] 1. Of or pertaining to handling or manipulation, either literally or figuratively.

Mr. Squills . . . began mending it [the pen] furiously—that is, cutting it into slivers—thereby denoting symbolically how he would like to do with Uncle Jack, could he once get him safe and snug under his manipular operations. Bulwer, Caxtons, xi. 7.

What the former age has epitomized into a formula or rule for manipular convenience, it [the mind] will lose all the good of verifying for itself. Emerson, History.

2. Of or pertaining to a maniple or company of soldiers: as, the manipular system of Roman tactics.

manipulate (mā-nip'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. manipulated, ppr. manipulating. [< ML. manipulatus, pp. of manipulare (> It. manipolare = Sp. Pg. manipular = F. manipuler), take or lead by the hand, < manipulus, a handful: see maniple.] I. trans. 1. To handle, or act on with the hands, as in artistic or mechanical operations; hence, in general, to subject to certain mechanical operations or to some method of handling, arranging, combining, etc.: as, the chemist exercises great care in manipulating his materials and apparatus.—2. Figuratively, to operate upon by contrivance or influence; affect in a particular way by a definite course of treatment; manage; specifically, to manage insidiously; adapt or apply to one's own purpose or advantage; treat or use falsely or deceptively: as, to manipulate accounts or the facts of history (with the purpose of falsifying them).

The king undertook that the powers of parliament should not be again delegated to a committee such as Richard had manipulated so cleverly.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 303.

He found it necessary to manipulate his parliamentary foes with the prospect of his resignation.
Lowe, Bismarck, II. 485.

II. intrans. To use the hands, as in mechanical or artistic operations, scientific experiments, mesmerism, etc.: as, to manipulate neatly or successfully.

manipulation (mā-nip-ū-lā′shon), n. [= F. manipulation = Sp. manipulación = Pg. manipulação = It. manipolazione, < ML. as if manipulatio*(n-), < manipulare, lead by the hand: see manipulate.] 1. The act or art of manipulating; manual management; manual and mechanical operation of any kind in science or art, specifically, in phar., the preparation of drugs; in chem., the preparation and employment of utensils, apparatus, and reagents in chemical work.—2. Figuratively, the act of operating upon anything by contrivance or influence; management; specifically, insidious management; adjustment or accommodation to one's own purpose or advantage: as, manipulation of voters, figures, or facts.

Given an average defect of nature among the units of a society, and no skillful manipulation of them will prevent that defect from producing its equivalents of bad results.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 22.

There was then, as always, a form of statecraft which meant manipulation, which never presides at the formation of parties based on principle; which is, in fact, too busy in "handling" to do much with heading parties.
The Century, XXXVI. 953.

manipulative (mā-nip′ū-lā-tiv), a. [< manipulate + -ive.] Of or pertaining to manipulation: as, manipulative power or skill.

Indeed, it may be questioned whether, in the absence of that exercise of manipulative faculty which the making of weapons originally gave, there would ever have been produced the tools required for developed industry.
H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 194.

manipulator (mā-nip′ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. manipulateur = Sp. Pg. manipulador = It. manipolatore; as manipulate + -or.] 1. One who manipulates, in any sense of that word.

Lowell, who had helped in his way in founding . . . the new Republican party, could never look into the face of a manipulator without a laugh; and the more he looked the more he laughed.
The Century, XXXVI. 953.

2. An exercising-machine, or a device for rubbing the body.—3. In photog., a tool for holding a glass plate during preparation or development.—4. In teleg., the transmitter of a dial-telegraph.—5. A machine for handling hot blooms and billets in iron- and steel-manufacturing. A series of parallel rollers of equal diameter, all geared together and turning one way, carry the blooms or billets along in the desired direction, while a series of crescent-shaped arms working between the rollers turn over the blooms or billets as required, without interfering with their transmission. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIX. 166.

manipulatory (mā-nip′ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< manipulate + -ory.] Of or pertaining to manipulation; suitable for use in manipulations.

That legs are to a considerable degree capable of performing the duties of arms is proved by the great amount of manipulatory skill reached by them when the arms are absent.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 60.

Manis (mā′nis), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), so called in ref. to their nocturnal habits, < L. manis*, assumed sing. of manes, ghosts: see manes.] 1. The typical genus of Manidæ, formerly including all the pangolins, now usually restricted to those in which the tail is very long and tapering, the scales are narrow, and the feet hairy. Such are the long-tailed pangolin, M. longicauda, and the phatagin, M. tricuspis, both of which are African. The genera Pholidotus and Smutsia have been detached from Manis. See Manidæ and pangolin.
2. [l. c.] A member of this genus, or any pangolin. [With a rare plural, manises. Owen.]

Manisk†, a. and n. See Manx.

manito, manitou (man′i-tō, -tö), n. [Algonkian: cf. Mass. manitto, he is a god, Narragansett manit, god.] A guardian spirit; a being of supernatural power. It originally signified among the Ojibwa and related tribes both the supernatural power residing in any object or being, and an object or being of supernatural power.

Gitche Manito the mighty,
He, the Master of Life, was painted
As an egg, with points projecting
To the four winds of the heavens.
Everywhere is the Great Spirit,
Was the meaning of the symbol.
Mitche Manito the mighty,
He, the dreadful Spirit of Evil,
As a serpent was depicted.
As Kenabeek, the great serpent.
Very crafty, very cunning,
Is the creeping Spirit of Evil,
Was the meaning of this symbol.
Longfellow, Hiawatha, xiv.

manitrunk (man′i-trungk), n. [< L. manus, hand, + truncus, trunk.] In entom., the prothorax, bearing the fore leg or manus; the anterior segment of the thorax or trunk, with which the head articulates. Compare alitrunk, and see manus.

manjack (man′jak), n. A large West Indian tree, of the species Cordia elliptica or C. macrophylla.

manjar-blanco†, n. [Sp., < manjar, eating, food, + blanco, white: see blanc-mange.] Same as blanc-mange. Minsheu.

manjore†, manjure†, n. Middle English forms of manger.

mank[1]† (mangk), v. t. [ME. manken, < AS. mancian*, in comp. be-mancian, mutilate, < manc* = D. MLG. mank, lame, defective; cf. MHG. manc, lack, defect; prob. < L. mancus, maimed, infirm, defective, imperfect. Cf. mangle[1].] To mutilate.

The rycht arme from the schuldir al to rent
Apoun [upon] the mankit sennouns hinges by,
As impotent. Gavin Douglas, tr. of Virgil, x. 47.

mank[2]†, n. [< ML. mancus (AS. mancus), a coin so called.] Same as mancus.

mankal, n. See mangal.

mankin[1]†, n. [ME., also manken, monkin, monkun, monkunne, < AS. mancyn, moncyn (= OS. mancunni = OHG. mancunni, manchunni, MHG. mankünne = Icel. mannkyn, mannkind = Sw. mänskön = Dan. mandkjön), the race of man, mankind, < man, mann, man, + cyn, cynn, race, kin: see man and kin[1]. Cf. mankind.] The race of man; mankind.

mankin[2] (man′kin), n. [< man + -kin.] A little man; a manikin. [Rare.]

The Mankin feels that he is a born Man, that his vocation is to work.
Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 63.

mankind (man-kīnd′, formerly also man′kind), n. and a. [< ME. mankinde, mankende, mankuinde; < man + kind[1]. This word has taken the place of the older mankin[1].] I. n. 1. The human race; men collectively.

Whiche byrthe was done in yt selfe moste holy place, to the gretest joye and gladnesse yt euer come to mankynde.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 37.

The proper study of mankind is man.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 2.

2. The masculine division of humanity; men, as distinguished from women.

Because thou art a woman, and disclaim'st
Flinty mankind. Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 491.

Of all mankind Lord Trinket is my aversion.
Colman, Jealous Wife, ii.

3†. Human kindness; humanity.

O you, whose minds are good,
And have not forced all mankind from your breasts.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 10.

II.† a. 1. Resembling man, not woman, in form or nature; unwomanly; masculine; coarse; bold.

A mankind witch! Hence with her, out o' door.
Shak., W. T., ii. 3. 67.

O mankind generation! B. Jonson, Epicœne, v. 1.

So, so, 'tis as 't should be, are women grown so mankind? Must they be wooing?
Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, iii. 2.

2. Of virile power; strong; ferocious; furious.

Terrible lions, many a mankind bear. Chapman.

Manks (mangks), a. and n. See Manx.

manless (man′les), a. [< ME. manles*, < AS. manleás, without men, uninhabited (= MLG. manlōs, without men, = MHG. manlōs, unmanly, cowardly, = Icel. mannlauss), < mann, man, + -leás, E. -less: see man and -less.] 1. Without men or people; uninhabited.

It was no more but a strategem of fire-boats, manless, and sent upon them by the favour of the wind in the night-time. Bacon, War with Spain.

The world was void, . . .
Seasonless, herbless, treeless, manless, lifeless.
Byron, Darkness.

2†. Unmanly; base; cowardly; dastardly; unbecoming a man.

Stuffed with manless cruelty. Chapman.

That pusillanimity and manless subjugation.
Waterhouse, Apology for Learning, p. 82.

manlessly† (man′les-li), adv. In a manless or unmanly manner; inhumanly.

She saw her Hector slaine, and bound
T' Achilles' chariot; manlessly drag'd to the Grecian fleet.
Chapman, Iliad, xxii.

manlihead†, n. [ME. manlihead; < manly + -head.] Manliness; vigor; courage.

With hys swerd so gripte of fine manly-hede.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 5876.

manlike (man′līk), a. [< man + like[2]. Cf. manly.] 1. Resembling man in form or nature.

Under his forming hands a creature grew,
Man-like, but different sex. Milton, P. L., viii. 471.

Man-like is it to fall into sin,
Fiend-like is it to dwell therein.
Longfellow, Poetic Aphorisms, tr. from Friedrich von [Logau.

2. Having the qualities proper or becoming to a man, as distinguished from a woman; masculine; manly.

They spede at the spurre, with-owttyne speche more,
To the Marche of Meyes, theis manliche knyghtez.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2418.

Elizabeth, the next, this falling sceptre hent;
Digressing from her sex, with manlike government,
This island kept in awe. Drayton, Polyolbion, xvii.

Venerable too is the rugged face; . . . for it is the face of a man living manlike. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 157.

manlily (man′li-li), adv. In a manly or courageous manner. Sharon Turner. [Rare.]

manliness (man′li-nes), n. The quality of being manly, or of possessing the distinctive attributes of a man; character or conduct worthy of a man; manhood.

Manliness and manfulness are synonymous, but they embrace more than we ordinarily mean by the word courage; for instance, tenderness and thoughtfulness for others. They include that courage which lies at the root of all manliness, but is, in fact, only its lowest or rudest form.
T. Hughes, Manliness of Christ, ii.

manling (man′ling), n. [< man + -ling[1].] A little man. [Rare.]

Augustus often called him his witty manling, for the littleness of his stature. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

manly (man′li), a. [< ME. manly, manliche, < AS. manlīc* (in adv. manlīce) (= MLG. manlik = OHG. manlīh = Icel. mannligr = Sw. manlig = Dan. mandlig), manly, masculine, < mann, man: see man and -ly[1].] 1†. Humane; charitable; hospitable.

2. Possessing the proper characteristics of a man; independent in spirit or bearing; strong, brave, large-minded, etc.

The like manly womanhood (if a Christian might commend that which none but a Christian can discommend).
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 322.

Now clear the ring, for, hand to hand,
The manly wrestlers take their stand.
Scott, L. of the L., v. 23.

3. Pertaining to or becoming a man; not boyish or womanish; marked by or manifesting the quality of manhood; suitable for a man.

This prince was hold full manly of his hande.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 1932.

His big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish treble, pipes
And whistles in his sound.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 161.

Therefore with manlier objects we must try
His constancy; with such as have more show
Of worth, of honour, glory, and popular praise.
Milton, P. R., ii. 225.

=Syn. 2. Manful, etc. (see masculine); honorable, high-minded.

manly (man′li), adv. [< ME. manly, < AS. manlīce, manfully (= D. manlijk = Icel. mannliga = G. mannlich, manfully), < manlīc*, manly: see manly, a.] In the manner of a man; manfully.

Had lied.
R. Buchanan, in N. A. Rev., CXL. 447.

man-mercer† (man′mėr″sėr), n. One who deals in goods for men's wear. Also called man-huckster.

man-midwife (man′mid″wīf), n. A man who practises obstetrics; an accoucheur.

man-milliner (man′mil″i-nėr), n. A milliner of the male sex; especially, one who undertakes the manufacture of women's bonnets, etc., employing others to do the work.

An empty-pated fellow, and as conceited as a man-milliner. T. Hook, All in the Wrong, ii.

manna (man′ą), n. [< ME. manna, manne, < AS. manna, monna = D. G. Dan. Sw. Goth. manna = F. manne = Sp. maná = Pg. maná, manná = It. manna, < L. manna, f. (Pliny), LL. (Vulgate) manna, and man, neut. or indeclinable, < Gr. μάννα, a concrete vegetable exudation, a grain, in the Old Testament manna, < Heb. mān (= Ar. mann), manna, described, as found by the Israelites, as "a small round thing, as small as the hoar frost on the ground. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna [in the Vulgate: "Manhu? quod significat: Quid est hoc?"]: for they wist not what it was" (Ex. xvi. 14, 15), implying that the name thus arose from the question, Heb. mān hū, 'what is this?'; but this is doubtless a popular etymology. The name is otherwise referred to Heb. man, a gift, Ar. mann, favor.] 1. The food by which the children of Israel were sustained in the wilderness (Ex. xvi. 14–36; Num. xi. 6, 7). The circumstances attending the gift of manna show that it was believed to be miraculous. Modern commentators differ in opinion as to its probable nature: by some it is identified with an exudation of the tamarisk-tree, and by others with a lichen which, torn from its home and carried vast distances by the wind, still falls and is gathered for food in the Sinaitic peninsula (see manna-lichen); and by others it is regarded as a special and miraculous creation.

And the house of Israel called the name thereof Manna: and it was like coriander seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey. Ex. xvi. 31.

Each morning, on the ground
Not common dew, but Manna, did abound.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., Eden.

Hence—2. Delicious food for either the body or the mind; delectable material for nourishment or entertainment.

His tongue
Dropp'd manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash Maturest counsels. Milton, P. L., ii. 113.

Mine was an angel's portion then,
And, while I fed with eager haste,
The crust was manna to my taste.
J. Montgomery, A Poor Wayfaring Man of Grief.

3. Divine or spiritual food.

Thou Manna, which from Heav'n we eat,
To every Taste a several Meat!
Cowley, The Mistress, For Hope.

4. In phar., a sweet concrete juice obtained by incisions made in the stem of Fraxinus Ornus, a native of Sicily, Calabria, and other parts of the south of Europe, and from other species of ash. It is either naturally concreted or exsiccated and purified by art. At the present day the manna of commerce is collected exclusively in Sicily, where the manna-ash is cultivated for the purpose in regular plantations. The best manna is in oblong pieces or flakes of a whitish or pale-yellow color, light, friable, and somewhat transparent. It has a slight peculiar odor, and a sweetish taste mixed with a slight degree of bitterness, and is employed as a gentle laxative for children or persons of weak habit. It is, however, generally used as an adjunct to other more active medicines. It consists principally of a crystallizable sweet substance named mannite, and certain other substances in smaller quantity. Sweetish secretions exuded by some other plants growing in warm and dry climates, as the Eucalyptus viminalis, the manna-gumtree of Australia, and Tamarix mannifera, of Arabia and Syria, are also considered to be kinds of manna. Small quantities of manna, known as Briaçon manna, are obtained from the common larch, Larix decidua.— Jews' or Hebrew manna, manna of Sinai. (a) An exudation from the leguminous plants called camel's-thorn, Alhagi camelorum and *A. mannite (man'īt), n. [< manna + -ite[2].] A neutral substance ($C_6H_{14}O_6$) found in a number of plants, chiefly in the larch and manna-ash (Fraxinus Ornus), and also formed by the mucous fermentation of sugars. It is a white, odorless, crystalline substance, having a sweet taste, readily soluble in water, and exists in three optical varieties. Regarded as a hexatomic alcohol.

mannitic (ma-nit'ik), a. [< mannite + -ic.] Containing or related to mannite.—Mannitic fermentation, a fermentation by which glucose or altered cane-sugar is resolved into gum, mannite, and carbonic acid. It is not uncommon in certain saccharine liquids, and in wines produces the defect called ropiness. Encyc. Brit., IX. 96.

mannitol (man'i-tol), n. [< mannite + (alcoh)ol.] Same as mannite.

mannitose† (man'i-tōs), n. Same as mannite.

mannynose, n. See maninose.

manœuver, manœuvre (ma-nö'vėr or ma-nū'vėr), n. [Also maneuver, maneuvre; < F. manœuvre, OF. manouvre, manovre = Sp. maniobra = Pg manobra = It. manovra, < ML. manuopera, manopera, a working with the hand, < L. manus (abl. manu), the hand, + opera, work: see main[3] and opera, and ure, and cf. manure and mainor, of the same ult. origin.] 1. A planned and regulated movement, particularly of troops or warvessels; any strategic evolution, movement, or change of position among companies, battalions, regiments, or of a ship or ships, etc.—2. Management with address or artful design; an adroit move or procedure; intrigue; stratagem.

To make them the principal, not the secondary theatre of their manœuvres for securing a determined majority in Parliament. Burke, Duration of Parliament.

3. An affected trick of manner to attract notice: as, he is full of manœuvers.—Manœuver line. See lines of operation, under line[2].—Mechanical manœuvers. See mechanical.=Syn. Trick, Stratagem, etc. See artifice.

manœuver, manœuvre (ma-nö'vėr or ma-nū'vėr), v.; pret. and pp. manœuvered, manœuvred, ppr. manœuvering, manœuvring. [Also maneuver, maneuvre; < F. manœuvrer, OF. manouvrer, manovrer = Sp. maniobrar = Pg. manobrar = It. manovrare, manœuver; from the noun.] I. intrans. 1. To perform manœuvers; move or change positions among troops or ships for the purpose of advantageous attack or defense, or in military exercise for the purpose of discipline.—2. To manage with address or art; employ intrigue or stratagem to effect a purpose.

I never, by any manœuvring, could get him to take the spiritual view of things. Thoreau, Walden, p. 162.

II. trans. 1. To change the position of, as troops or ships; cause to perform strategic evolutions.

Sir Geo. Rodney . . . now manœuvred the fleet with such skill as to gain the windward of the enemy during the night, and entirely to preclude their retreat.
Belsham, Hist. Great Britain, April 8, 1782.

2. To affect in some specified way by a manœuver or by manœuvers.

Instead of seizing his opportunity to win a great battle or to capture an army by siege, he had simply manœuvred the enemy out of position. The Century, XXXVI. 673.

3. To manipulate. [Rare.]

The usual trick consisted in the power to see a great deal through a very small opening in the skilfully manœuvred bandage. Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 79.

man-of-the-earth (man'ov-thē-ėrth'), n. The wild potato-vine, Ipomœa pandurata, so called from the great size sometimes attained by the root.

man-of-war (man'ov-wâr'), n.; pl. men-of-war. [< ME. man of werre: see under man, n. Cf. war-man.] 1. An armed ship; a publicly recognized vessel fitted for engaging in battle; a ship of war.

And leave you not a man-of-war unsearch'd;
This wicked emperor may have shipp'd her hence.
Shak., Tit. And., iv. 3. 22.

2. In coal-mining, one of the small pillars left to support the roof of the chambers (or sides of work, as they are called locally) in working the "ten-yard coal" in Staffordshire, England.—Man-of-war bird. (a) The frigate-bird or frigate-pelican, Tachypetes aquila or Fregata aquila: so called from its formidable swoop and predatory habits. See frigate-bird, with cut. (b) One of the jägers or skuas: a wrong use.—Man-of-war fashion, a neat, orderly, and seamanlike manner, indicative of good discipline.—Portuguese man-of-war, a popular name of an oceanic siphonophorous hydrozoan of the genus Physalia.

man-of-war's-man (man'ov-wârz'man), n. An enlisted man belonging to a man-of-war.

manometer (mā-nom'e-tėr), n. [= F. manomètre = Sp. manómetro, < Gr. μανός, rare, not dense, thin, loose, slack, few, scanty, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for determining and indicating the elastic pressure of gases or vapors. It measures the weight of a column of liquid or the tension of a spring that exactly balances the elastic pressure of the gas on a unit of area; and, since the relative density of a gas is proportional to its elastic pressure, the measurement of the latter determines also the former. Manometers which measure elastic gaseous pressure by the tension of a spring are used for steam-gages. In some forms the pressure of the gas is on a piston or diaphragm connected with a counterbalancing spring. In others the initial pressure is received on a small primary piston, or diaphragm, and transmitted by a fluid mass acting upon a secondary and much larger piston or diaphragm upon which the pressure per unit of area is reduced inversely as the area of the smaller piston is to that of the larger. Of this kind is Shaw's gage for measuring very high pressures. In the Bourdon steam-gage a curved tubular spring is used, having its interior connected by a tube with the interior of the tank, boiler, cylinder, or gas-holder containing the vapor or gas to be tested. In all of these forms the parts moved under varying pressure are connected with an indicator, and the pressure is read on a graduated dial-plate. In the open-air manometer the elastic pressure of a gas is indicated by the height of a column of liquid, usually mercury or water, which it will support. In its simplest form an S-shaped glass tube, open at the upper end, is employed, as shown in the cut. In the compressed-air manometer the tube containing the liquid is closed at the top, and hence the varying elastic pressure of the confined air is added to the weight of the liquid column in balancing the gaseous pressure to be measured. The statical manometer of Boyle has a thin glass bulb counterpoised on a pair of delicate scales, the specific gravity of the bulb and its confined air varying with both pressure and temperature of the surrounding air. The manometer of Ramsden is essentially a compressed-air manometer combined with a scale which indicates temperatures while determining atmospheric density. The ordinary gas-gage is a simple open-air manometer.

Open-air Manometer.
a, brass coupling-tube; b b', glass tube of which part b' is graduated; c c', liquid column. Pressure transmitted through a depresses the part c of the liquid column and raises the part c'.

manometric (man-ō-met'rik), a. [= F. manométrique; as manometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the manometer; made with the manometer: as, manometric observations.—Manometric capsule. See manometric flames.—Manometric flames of König (see figures), an appearance produced by the reflection in a rotating mirror of a gas-flame which is made to pulsate by the action of sonorous waves. The sound is conducted by a tube to one side of a small metal capsule (manometric capsule), and causes the vibration of a dividing membrane the other side of which is connected with the gas-jet. Of the figures here given, the first is that caused by a single tone, and the second corresponds to the simultaneous production of a tone and its octave.

manometrical (man-ō-met′ri-kal), a. [< manometric + -al.] Same as manometric.

ma non troppo. See ma[3].

manor (man′ȯr), n. [Early mod. E. also mannor, manour, mannour, manner, maner, manere, manoir (ML. manerium), < OF. manoir (= Pr. maner), a mansion, < manoir, maneir, < L. manere, remain, dwell, = Gr. μένειν, stay, remain: see remain, remnant, etc., and cf. manse[2] and mansion, from the same source as manor.] 1†. A dwelling; habitation.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 1004.

2. In England, generally, a landed estate, especially one the tenure of which vests the proprietor with some particular rights of lordship; specifically, in old law, a lordship or barony held by a lord and subject to the jurisdiction of a court-baron held by him; in more ancient usage, an estate of a lord or thane with a village community, generally in serfdom, upon it. See villeinage and yard-land.

In the iii. yer of his reign in Septembre was bore to the kyng a sone cleped Richard, att Oxenford in his manoire, wher is now the white freres.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 484, note.

These manors [those with which England was covered about the time of the Domesday Survey] were in fact in their simplest form estates of manorial lords, each with its village community in villenage upon it. The land of the lord's demesne — the home farm belonging to the manor-house — was cultivated chiefly by the services of the villata, i. e. of the village community or tenants in villenage. The land of this village community, i. e. the land in villenage, lay round the village in open fields. In the villages were the messuages, or homesteads of the tenants in villenage, and their holdings were composed of bundles of scattered strips in the open fields, with rights of pasture over the latter for their cattle after the crops were gathered, as well as on the green commons of the manor or township.
Seebohm, Eng. Vil. Community, p. 76.

On close inspection, all feudal society is seen to be a reproduction of a single typical form. This unit consists of a group of men settled on a definite space of land, and forming what we Englishmen call a Manor, and what in France was called a Fief.
Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 302.

The name manor is of Norman origin, but the estate to which it was given existed, in its essential character, long before the Conquest; it received a new name as the shire also did, but neither the one nor the other was created by this change. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 98.

3†. The jurisdiction of a court-baron or court of the lord of a manor.—4. In some of the United States formed by English colonies, a tract of land occupied or once occupied by tenants paying a fee-farm rent to the proprietor, sometimes in kind, and sometimes in stipulated services. Burrill. In colonial times these resembled the old English manors, their possession being in most cases accompanied by jurisdiction.

man-orchis (man′ȯr″kis), n. [So called from a fancied resemblance between its lip and the body of a man hanging by the head.] A greenish-flowered orchid, Aceras anthropophora, which grows in meadows and pastures in the eastern part of England and occurs also in the south of Europe. The genus is distinguished from Orchis by the absence of a spur.

Man-slaughter, shall be held the highest pitch
Of human glory. Milton, P. L., xi. 693.

Specifically —2. In law, the unlawful killing of another without malice either express or implied, which may be either voluntarily, upon a sudden heat, or involuntarily, but in the commission of some unlawful act. Blackstone. Manslaughter differs from murder in not proceeding from malice prepense or deliberate, which is essential to constitute murder. It differs from excusable homicide, being done in consequence of some unlawful act, whereas excusable homicide happens in consequence of misadventure. Manslaughter has been distinguished as voluntary, where the killing was intentional in a sudden heat or passion without previous malice; and involuntary, where it was not intentional, but the slayer was at the time engaged in an unlawful act less than a felony, or doing a lawful act in an unlawful manner. This distinction of name is no longer used in procedure, except in those jurisdictions where it may be enjoined by statute.

manslayer (man′slā″ėr), n. [< ME. manslaer; < man + slayer.] A slayer of a man or of men; one who kills a human being.

3. A woman's head-covering, often of lace, which falls down upon the shoulders and may be used as a veil, worn in Spain and the Spanish colonies, in Genoa, and elsewhere.

> Her hair was partly covered by a lace mantilla, through which her arms, bare to the shoulder, gleamed white. R. L. Stevenson, The Dynamiter, p. 219.

Mantis (man'tis), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. μάντις, a diviner, seer, prophet, foreboder; also a locust or grasshopper described as having long thin fore legs, kept constantly in motion, perhaps Mantis religiosa, so called from the peculiar position of the fore legs, which resembles that of a person's hands at prayer; orig. one who utters oracles while in a state of divine frenzy, ‹ μαίνεσθαι, rage, be mad, ‹ μανία, frenzy: see mania.] 1. The typical genus of Mantidæ, formerly the same as the family, now much restricted. They are natives chiefly of tropical regions, but some species are common in temperate latitudes.— 2. [l. c.; pl. mantes (-tēz).] Any species of the family Mantidæ; a rearhorse. The common rearhorse or praying-mantis of the United States is Stagmomantis carolina.

Praying-mantis (Mantis religiosa), adult male, reduced one fourth.

mantis-crab (man'tis-krab), n. Same as mantis-shrimp, 1.

Mantisia (man-tis'i-ä), n. [NL. (Sims, 1810), ‹ mantis, the insect, which the flowers are thought to resemble.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants belonging to the Zingiberaceæ, or ginger family, and the tribe Zingibereæ. It is characterized by a one-celled ovary, with three parietal placentæ, and by having lateral opposite thread-shaped staminodia extending from the middle of the filament. They are herbs, with narrow leaves having a long twisted apex, and curious purple and yellow flowers growing in loose clusters. There are two species, indigenous to the East Indies; one of these, M. saltatoria, is often cultivated for the singularity and beauty of its flowers, which bear some resemblance to a ballet-dancer; hence the popular name dancing-girls or opera-girls. See dancing-girl, 2.

Mantispa (man-tis'pä), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1798), irreg. or erroneously for Mantiopa*, ‹ Gr. μάντις, an insect, NL. Mantis, + ὤψ (ὠπ-), face.] The typical genus of Mantispidæ, so called from the likeness to a mantis, the prothorax being long and slender, and the fore legs enlarged and bent for grasping. The larva is hypermetamorphic, and has a double molt. The larvæ live in the egg-bags of spiders. M. pagana is European; others are found in all the warmer parts of the world.

Mantispidæ (man-tis'pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Mantispa + -idæ.] A family of planipennine neuropterous insects, typified by the genus Mantispa. J. O. Westwood, 1840.

Mantispinæ (man-tis-pī'nē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Mantispa + -inæ.] The Mantispidæ considered as a subfamily of the neuropterous family Hemerobiidæ.

mantissa (man-tis'ä), n. [‹ L. mantissa, mantisa, an addition, a makeweight; of Etruscan origin.] 1. A supplementary treatise; a lesser work following one on the same subject. — 2. The decimal part of a logarithm: so called as being additional to the characteristic or integral part. Thus, in the logarithm of 900 = 2.95424 the characteristic is 2, and the mantissa is .95424. This use of the word was introduced by Henry Briggs, and is applied chiefly to Briggsian logarithms. See logarithm.

Mantis-shrimp (Squilla empusa).

3. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of mollusks.

mantis-shrimp (man'tis-shrimp), n. 1. A stomatopodous crustacean of the family Squillidæ, as Squilla mantis or S. empusa: so called from the resemblance to the insect called mantis. See Gonodactylus, Squilla. Also called mantis-crab and locust-shrimp.— 2. A læmodipodous crustacean of the family Caprellidæ, as Caprella linearis; a specter-shrimp: so called for the same reason as above.

mantistic (man-tis'tik), a. [Irreg. ‹ Gr. μάντις, a diviner, seer, prophet, + -istic.] Same as mantic.

> An idea of spiritual or mantistic qualities supposed to be peculiar to the female sex. A. Wilder, Knight's Anc. Art and Myth. (1876), p. 144.

★ mantle (man'tl), n. [Formerly also mantel (still retained in the architectural sense), mantell; ‹ ME. mantel, mantylle, partly (a) ‹ AS. mæntel, mentel = OFries. D. Pg. manta = F. mante, f., a cloak; perhaps orig. a 'hand-cloth,' ‹ manus, the hand, + tela, a web, texture: see toil[2]. A similar reduction of manus to man- occurs in mansuete, mancipate, etc.] 1. A loose sleeveless garment worn as an outer covering, falling in straight lines from the shoulders; a simple kind of cloak. Mantles were originally mere pieces of cloth of suitable size and shape, the upper corners of which were brought together and fastened at the neck or over one shoulder, with the loose edges lapping in front or at one side. Those worn during the middle ages and later were large and loose, capable of being drawn across the breast, but usually open in front and secured across the breast by a lace or chain. Long flowing mantles form a part of the distinguishing costume or insignia of British and other nobles and knights, and are represented more or less conventionally behind the escutcheon in coats of arms.

Mantle of Man-at-arms, 15th century.

> The damsell was in her smok, with a mantill a-bouten hir. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 17.

> And Elijah took his mantle, and wrapped it together, and smote the waters, and they were divided hither and thither, so that they two went over on dry ground. 2 Ki. ii. 8.

2. Figuratively, a cover or covering; something that conceals.

> Well covered with the night's black mantle. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., iv. 2. 22.

> Before the heavens thou wert, and, at the voice
> Of God, as with a mantle didst invest
> The rising world. Milton, P. L., iii. 10.

> A hot-water filter . . . in which the mantel of water between the glass funnel and the outer copper wall is kept warm by a flame which is placed under the tube. Hüppe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 133.

Specifically—(a) An outer covering of a wall, differing in material from the inner part. (b) In founding, a covering of porous clay laid over a pattern in wax. When heat is applied the wax melts and runs out, leaving the clay mantle in condition to serve as a mold. (c) The outer enveloping masonry of a blast-furnace. (d) In zoöl. and anat., some part or organ which covers, conceals, or mantles: (1) In Mollusca, the pallium. (2) In Cirripedia, the sac, formed by the dorsal part of the integument, which incloses the body. (3) In ornith., the pallium or stragulum. See stragulum. (4) The tunic of an ascidian. 3. In her., same as mantling, 3.— 4. An inclosed chute which leads water from a fore-bay to a water-wheel.— 5. In the incandescent gaslight of Dr. Auer von Welsbach, an incombustible mineral network suspended over and inclosing the non-luminous flame of a Bunsen burner fed by gas, coal-oil, or alcohol, and transforming the heat applied interiorly into intensely bright light. It is prepared by saturating a knitted tube of organic fiber, such as cotton, with a solution of salts of thorium and cerium in the approximate proportion of 99 to 1, drying and burning out the organic material, thus leaving the mineral matter in the form of the fabric. This is then coated with a film of collodion to impart strength to resist shocks in handling and transportation.—Duchesse mantle, a large easy silk cloak for women, worn about 1870.—Electoral mantle. See electoral.—Empress mantle, a kind of burnoose worn by women about 1860.—Josephine mantle, an outer garment for women, with a cape, worn about 1850.—Lady's mantle. See lady's-mantle.—To take the mantle or mantle and ring, to vow perpetual widowhood. During the fifteenth century and later, it was customary for widows to take such pledges, sometimes in the presence of a clergyman or other witnesses. See widow's mantle, below.—Watteau mantle, a woman's mantle or cloak worn about 1865, distinguished by a Watteau back and other resemblances to garments represented in the pictures of Watteau.—Widow's mantle, a mantle assumed, usually with a ring, as evidence of a vow of perpetual widowhood. It appears to have been a russet cloak.

mantle (man'tl), v.; pret. and pp. mantled, ppr. mantling. [‹ ME. mantlen; ‹ mantle, n.] I. trans. 1. To cover with or as if with a mantle; disguise; obscure or protect by covering up.

> So their rising senses
> Begin to chase the ignorant fumes that mantle
> Their clearer reason. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 67.

> Mar. Come I too late?
> Com. Ay, if you come not in the blood of others,
> But mantled in your own. Shak., Cor., i. 6. 29.

> Darkness the skies had mantled o'er
> In aid of her design. Cowper, Queen's Visit to London.

Specifically—2. In the manufacture of alum from aluminous shales or alum ores, to cover (a partly or completely calcined heap of the ore) with a layer of previously calcined ore. Volatilization and loss of sulphur from excessive heat and the injurious action of wind and rain are thus avoided during the progress of the operation and while the heap is cooling.

> Calcination is then effected by means of a smothered fire. . . . To this end, the mass is after a time covered with a coating of calcined ore, or mantled, as it is termed, in order to shelter the burning heap from wind and rain, and to moderate the heat. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 327.

II. intrans. 1. To expand and spread; serve as a mantle or covering.

> The pair [of wings] that clad
> Each shoulder broad came mantling o'er his breast
> With regal ornament. Milton, P. L., v. 279.

2. To become covered with a coating, as a barmy liquid; send up froth or scum; cream, or cream over; foam.

> The cup of joy
> Unmingled mantles to the goblet's brim.
> Shelley, Queen Mab, viii.

3. To be or become overspread or suffused, as with blushes or color; hence, to display a superficial change of hue or of expression.

> At the distant hint of dark surmise,
> The blood into the mantling cheek would rise.
> Crabbe, Works, V. 120.

> The rosy blush of morn began to mantle in the east. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 109.

> You could see an unusual, because a lively, spark dancing in his eyes, and a new-found vivacity mantling on his dark physiognomy. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, iii.

4. In falconry, to stretch out one wing after the leg, as a hawk, by way of relief; spread out the wings for ease: sometimes used figuratively.

> There my fraile fancy, fed with full delight,
> Doth bath in blisse, and mantleth most at ease.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 158.

II. n. 1. One who labors with his hands; a handicraftsman; an artificer; an artisan.

There are some special gifts of the Spirit, which we call charismata, which do no more argue a right to the sonship of God than the manuary's infused skill of Bezaleel and Aholiab could prove them saints. Bp. Hall, Sermon on Rom. viii. 14.

2. A consecrated glove.

Some manuaries for handlers of relics.
Latimer, Works, I. 49. (Davies.)

manubial† (mą-nū'bi-ąl), a. [< L. manubialis, of or belonging to booty, < manubiæ, money obtained from the sale of booty, also booty, spoils, < manus, the hand: see manual.] Belonging to spoils; taken in war.—Manubial column. See column.

manubria, n. Plural of manubrium.

manubrial (mą-nū'bri-ąl), a. [< manubrium + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to a manubrium; having the character of a manubrium; resembling a handle: as, the manubrial part of the sternum.

manubriated (mą-nū'bri-ā-ted), a. [< manubrium + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] Having a manubrium, as a sternum: used chiefly in ornithology.

manubrium (mą-nū'bri-um), n.; pl. manubria (-ą). [= Sp. Pg. manubrio, < L. manubrium, a handle, haft, hilt, < manus, the hand: see manual.] 1. In some technical uses, a handle or haft. Specifically—2. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) The presternum, or first piece of the sternum, of most mammals; the anterior, or in man the upper, segment of the sternum, corresponding to the first pair of ribs, and succeeded by a piece or pieces collectively called the gladiolus or mesosternum. See cut under sternum. (b) In birds, a small process, often forked, of the fore border of the sternum, in the middle line, at the root of the keel. See cut under epipleura. (c) The handle of the malleus; the process of the outer ear-bone, connected with the inner surface of the tympanic membrane. See cut under ossiculum. (d) In hydrozoans, the sac or polypite which projects from the center of the concavity of the nectocalyx of a medusa or the gonocalyx of a medusiform gonophore. See medusoid.—3. In bot., a cylindrical cell which arises from the center of the inner face of each of the eight shields that compose the wall of the antheridium in the Characeæ. Also called handle. Compare head, 6 (c), and head-cell.

From the center of the inner face of each shield a cylindrical cell, termed a handle or manubrium, projects inwards nearly to the center of the globe.
Bennett and Murray, Cryptogamic Bot., p. 177.

4. In organ-building, a stop-knob or handle.

manucaption (man-ū-kap'shọn), n. [< ML. manucaptio(n-), < L. manus, hand, + captio(n-), taking: see caption.] In old law, a writ for the appearance or bringing in of a person who could not be admitted to bail by the sheriff or an inferior magistrate.

This manucaption was intended to secure the attendance of the members. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 424.

manucaptor (man-ū-kap'tọr), n. [< ML. manucaptor, < L. manus, hand, + captor, a taker (hunter): see captor.] In old law, one who stands bail for the appearance of another; a surety.

For each of them [newly chosen representatives] manucaptors or bailsmen were provided, who were bound for their obedience to the writ, and the names of the manucaptors were entered in the return. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 424.

manucode (man′ū-kōd), n. [< Manucodia.] A bird of Paradise of the genus Manucodia of Boddaert; a chalybean. The term has also been used for some of the true birds of Paradise of the genus Paradisea of Linnæus or Manucodiata of Brisson.

Manucodia (man-ū-kō′di-ạ), n. [NL. (Boddaert, 1783), a misprint for Manucodiata, q. v.] A genus of sturnoid passerine birds, either included in the family Paradiseidæ or placed in Sturnidæ, and typical of a subfamily Manucodiinæ (also called Phonygama by Lesson in 1828, and Chalybæus by Cuvier in 1829); the manucodes or chalybeans. There are several species of these beautiful birds, with glossy blue-black plumage, inhabiting the Papuan region, or New Guinea and the islands zoölogically related thereto. The longest- and best-known of these is M. viridis, called M. chalybæus by Boddaert, and Chalybæus paradiseus by Cuvier. M. keraudreni (Lesson), M. gouldi (Gray), M. atra (Lesson), M. pyrrhoptera (Temminck), M. morotensis (Schlegel), and M. obiensis (Bernstein) are others; the last three form a separate subgenus called Lycocorax by Bonaparte in 1853.

manucodiata (man-ū-kō-di-ā′tạ), n. [NL., from a Malay name manuk-dewata, a bird of Paradise, lit. 'bird of the gods.' Cf. mamuque.] 1. An old and disused name for a bird of Paradise.

The male and female Manucordiata [read manucodiata?], the male having a hollow in the back, in which it is reported the female both lays and hatches her eggs.
Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 4, 1645.

2. [cap.] A genus of Paradise birds established by Brisson in 1760, equivalent to the Linnean genus Paradisea. Two species were included by Brisson under this generic name, Manucodiata major and M. minor, corresponding respectively to the Paradisea apoda and P. regia of Linnæus, neither of which pertains to the later genus Manucodia. [Not in use.]

Manucodiinæ (man-ū-kō-di-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Manucodia + -inæ.] A subfamily of birds named by Cabanis in 1847 from the genus Manucodia. The term is little used; but by G. R. Gray (1870) it is employed for a subfamily of Sturnidæ composed of the two genera Astrapia and Manucodia.

manuducent† (man-ū-dū′sent), n. [< ML. manuducen(t-)s, ppr. of manuducere, lead by the hand, < L. manus, the hand, + ducere, lead: see duct.] One who leads by the hand; a manuductor. [Rare.]

manuduction (man-ū-duk′shon), n. [= Sp. manuducción, < ML. manuductio(n-), < manuducere, lead by the hand: see manuducent.] A leading by the hand; the act of guiding; careful guidance. [Archaic.]

The only door to enter into the kingdom of God was water, by the manuduction of the Spirit.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 151.

It is amusing to see the imperial air with which he enounces his behests to applicants for his manuduction.
F. Hall, Recent English, p. 112.

manuductor (man-ū-duk′tor), n. [= F. manuducteur = Sp. manuductor, < ML. manuductor, < manuducere, lead by the hand: see manuducent.] One who leads by the hand; a leader; a guide; specifically, in medieval music, one who indicated the rhythm to a choir by beating time with his hand or by striking pieces of wood or shell together; a conductor. [Archaic.]

Love be your manuductor; may the tears
Of penitence free you from (all) future fears.
Jordan, Poems.

manuductory (man-ū-duk′tō-ri), a. [< manuductor: see -ory.] Leading by or as by the hand; serving as a guide, or for guidance. Bp. Wordsworth, Church Hist., I. 229.

manufact† (man-ū-fakt′), n. [< L. manufactus, made by hand: see manufacture.] Manufacture.

A great part of the linen manufact is done by women and children. Maydman, Naval Speculations, p. 312.

T' encourage woolen manufact.
D'Urfey, Collin's Walk, iii.

manufactory (man-ū-fak′tō-ri), a. and n. [< L. manus, the hand, + factorius*, adj., neut. LL. factorium, an oil-press, later a factory: see factory. Cf. manufacture.] I.† a. Of or pertaining to manufacturing; employed in manufacturing: as, a manufactory operation. Swift.

Servile and manufactory men, that should serve the uses of the world in handicrafts.
Lord, Hist. Banians (1630), p. 70. (Latham.)

II. n.; pl. manufactories (-riz). 1†. The act of manufacturing; manufacture.

To give ease and encouragement to manufactory at home.
Bolingbroke, Spirit of Patriotism, p. 190. (Latham.)

Manulea (mā-nū′lē-ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1767), so called in allusion to the five lobes of the corolla; < L. manus, hand.] A genus of plants of the family Scrophulariaceæ, type of the tribe Manuleæ, distinguished by the five-parted or -cleft calyx, the slender suberect corolla, the lobes of which are often notched, and the entire style. There are about 26 species, which are herbs, rarely shrubs, and all natives of southern Africa. The flowers are small, generally orange-colored, disposed in simple or compound racemes. The fruit is a capsule with the valves two-cleft at the apex.

Manuleæ (mā-nū-lē′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1898), < Manulea + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Scrophulariaceæ, distinguished by having the lower leaves almost always opposite, the fifth stamen much reduced or rarely perfect, the anthers one-celled, the capsule dehiscent into valves, and the inflorescence centripetal. The tribe includes 7 genera and about 159 species, which are mostly herbs, the majority being natives of southern Africa. Written Manuleæ by Endlicher (1836).

manumise†, manumiss† (man-ū-mīz′, -mis′), v. t. [Also manumize; < L. manumissus, pp. of manumittere, manumit: see manumit.] Same as manumit.

Whether, then, being my manumised slave,
He owed not himself to me?
Massinger, Maid of Honour, v. 2.

The episcopal reformation has manumized kings from the usurpation of Rome.
Dryden, Ded. of Plutarch's Lives.

manumission (man-ū-mish′on), n. [< F. manumission = Sp. manumisión = Pg. manumissão = It. manumissione, < L. manumissio(n-), the freeing of a slave, < manumittere, pp. manumissus, free, manumit: see manumit.] Liberation from slavery, bondage, or restraint; a setting free; emancipation. [To complete the usual legal ceremony of manumission in ancient Rome, the master turned the slave around and released him from his hand before a magistrate.]

Then whereto serves it to have been enlarg'd
With this free manumission of the mind?
Daniel, Musophilus.

Languages, by a regardless Adoption of some new Words, and Manumission of old, do often vary, yet the whole Bulk of the Speech keeps intire. Howell, Letters, iv. 19.

Villeins might be enfranchised by manumission, which is either express or implied: express, as where a man granted to the villein a deed of manumission.
Blackstone, Com., II. vi.

manumit (man-ū-mit′), v. t.; pret. and pp. manumitted, ppr. manumitting. [= OF. manumetre, manumettre, manumiter = Sp. manumitir = It. manomettere, manimettere, < L. manumittere, release from one's power, set at liberty, free, enfranchise, < manus, hand, power, + mittere, send: see mission.] To release from slavery; liberate from personal bondage or servitude; set free, as a slave; emancipate.

ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS

HORÆ BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS ad usum Romanum, cum calendario. MS. of the second part of the fifteenth century, on choice vellum; written in black and blue (now faded) and probably executed in Anjou. Embellished with thirteen very fine large miniatures and 135 lateral borders of flowers, scrolls, birds, insects, human figures, chimeras, etc.; elegantly painted in gold and brilliant colors. A very beautiful manuscript executed for Catherine d'Armagnac, second wife of Jean II., Duc de Bourbon, called "le Bon" [1484-86]. The large miniatures were probably painted by a different artist from the one who executed the small ones in the calendar. They are specimens of the best French illuminating of the fifteenth century, and recall the work of Jean Foucquet. Their subjects are the usual ones occurring in all books of Hours. On nine leaves there are the interlaced initials of Jean and Catherine.

HORÆ BEATÆ MARIÆ VIRGINIS ad usum Romanum, cum calendario. Manuscript on vellum of the fifteenth century, written in Gothic characters, with the calendar in gold, blue and red; probably executed at Tours or in the neighborhood. Embellished with thirty-nine fine large miniatures, nearly all divided into compartments. All the pages of the text are surrounded by elaborate borders in black tracery and burnished gold, with corner sprays of flowers in blue, green, dull red, and gold "camaïeu," each border containing three small miniatures, which are repeated on the verso of the leaf, but reversed, so as to be seen against the light. A magnificent manuscript of great value.

Heaven and earth never agreed better to frame a place for mans habitation, were it fully manured and inhabited by industrious people. Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 114.

3. To apply manure to; treat with a fertilizer or fertilizing materials or elements: as, to manure a field or a crop.

Mawene and un-made, maynoyrede bott lyttylle,
In swathes sweppene downe fulle of swete floures.
Thare unbrydilles theis bolde, and baytes theire horses.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2507.

With branches overgrown,
That mock our scant manuring, and require
More hands than ours to lop their wanton growth.
Milton, P. L., iv. 628.

The soil will in due time be manured by the overflowing of that river [the Nile], though they neither see nor know the true cause of it. Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xv.

4. To serve as manure for.

The corps of half her senate Manure the fields of Thessaly. Addison, Cato, ii. 1.

★manure (mạ-nūr'), n. [< manure, v.] Any substance added to the soil with the view of rendering it more fertile; specifically, and as used in leases and other contracts relating to real property, the excrementitious product of live stock, with refuse litter, accumulated, and used for enriching the land. Animal substances employed as manures comprehend the putrefying carcasses of animals, ground bones, blood, the excrements of animals, as the dung of horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, etc., urine, guano (the decomposed excrement of aquatic birds, also of bats), the scrapings of leather and horn, the refuse of the shambles, the hair or wool of animals, etc. Liquid manure, consisting of town sewage, the drainings of dung-heaps, stables, and cow-houses, etc., is largely employed in many places. Almost every kind of vegetable substance, in one state or another, is used as manure. The principal mineral matters employed as manures are lime and other alkaline substances, chalk, sand, clay, marl, various sulphates, phosphates, nitrates, etc.

manure-distributer (mạ-nūr'dis-trib″ū-tėr), n. An agricultural machine for spreading a layer of manure evenly over the ground.

manure-drag (mạ-nūr'drag), n. In agri., a horse-fork with curved tines projecting downward, used for hauling manure from a wagon in unloading, for dragging it to a place convenient for piling or loading, or for distributing over a field and harrowing in manure that has been dumped in heaps. Also called manure-hook.

manure-drill (mạ-nūr'dril), n. In agri.: (a) An attachment to a grain-drill which deposits powdered manure either in the seed-row or broadcast, as may be desired. (b) A form of watering-cart for distributing in streams over the surface of a field liquid manure carried in the box of the vehicle. E. H. Knight.

manure-fork (mạ-nūr'fôrk), n. A fork, usually with four flat prongs, used for lifting and distributing manure.

manure-hook (mạ-nūr'hůk), n. In agri., a hand-tool having tines bent at a right angle with the handle. Used in spreading manure.

manure-loader (mạ-nūr'lō″dėr), n. A form of horse-fork for loading into a wagon large bunches of stable-manure. E. H. Knight.

manurement† (mạ-nūr'mẹnt), n. [< manure + -ment.] The art or process of manuring or cultivating; cultivation. Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 76.

manurer (mạ-nūr'ėr), n. One who manures lands.

manure-spreader (mạ-nūr'spred″ėr), n. Same as manure-distributer.

Manuria (mā-nū'ri-ạ), n. [NL., from an E. Ind. name.] 1. A genus of turtles, typical of the subfamily Manuriana. Also Manouria.—2. [l. c.] A land-tortoise of this genus, Manuria fusca, inhabiting parts of the hill-country of India. In some respects it resembles a fresh-water turtle of the family Clemmyidæ. The plastron has ten plates, disposed in five pairs; the two pectoral shields are small, angular, and removed toward the sides at the hinder ★edge of the axillæ.

manurial (mạ-nū'ri-ạl), a. [< manure + -ial.] Of or pertaining to manure; serving for manure; fertilizing: as, the manurial value of phosphates.

To maintain its good tilth by the manurial products which it is now capable of supplying.
J. R. Nichols, Fireside Science, p. 104.

manurially (mạ-nū'ri-ạl-i), adv. As regards manure or its production.

Manuriana (mā-nū-ri-an'ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Manuria + -ana.] In Gray's system of classification, a subfamily of Testudinidæ, typified by the genus Manuria, including two Indian species of separate genera, more like the fresh-water tortoises than the other Testudinidæ. ★Also Manouriana.

manus (mā'nus), n.; pl. manus. [L., the hand, hence power: see *main*³, manual, etc.] 1. The hand. Technically, in zoöl. and anat.: (a) The distal segment of the fore limb of a vertebrated animal, including all beyond the forearm or fore leg (antebrachium). It is divided into three segments, the carpus, the metacarpus, and the phalanges. See hand. [The word is used to avoid the implication of any difference between "hand" as of a man and "fore foot" as of a quadruped; it is chiefly a morphological term, opposed to pes, which is the corresponding segment of the hind limb. Sometimes called pes anticus.] (b) The prehensile organ of a crustacean; the chela or great chelate claw, as of a lobster. (c) In entom., the tarsus of the anterior leg. Kirby. (d) In ichth., the pectoral fin.

2. In Rom. law: (a) Same as dominium, but more commonly used of power over persons.

Old blind Appius Claudius, or old Cato the Censor, was not stronger than the young men who were in his manus; and yet both of them ruled their respective households with absolute sway. W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 28.

(b) More specifically, the power of a Roman husband over his wife: as, in manu (of a woman), under the marital authority.

manuscript (man'ū-skript), a. and n. [= F. manuscrit = Sp. manuscrito = Pg. manuscripto = It. manoscritto, manuscritto, a. and n., < ML. manuscriptus*, a., L. prop. as two words, manu scriptus, written by hand, ML. (neut.) manuscriptum, n., a book or paper written by hand; < manu, abl. of manus, hand, + scriptus, pp. of scribere, write: see script. Cf. chirograph, of like meaning.] I. a. 1. Written with the hand; in handwriting (not printed).

In a manuscript account of the building of the palace, it is mentioned that at the entrance were two columns.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 250.

2. Consisting of writings or written books.

He expended upwards of £300 in arranging and improving the manuscript library at Lambeth.
Bp. Porteus, Abp. Secker, p. 55.

II. n. 1. A book, paper, or instrument written by hand with ink or other pigment, or with a pencil or the like; a writing of any kind, as distinguished from anything that is printed. Especially—2. Such a book, paper, or instrument so written before the introduction and general adoption of printing in the fifteenth century, or in a style in vogue before the invention of printing. The oldest surviving manuscripts are Egyptian, of which some are at least 3,500 years old. Ancient manuscripts are written on papyrus, parchment, or vellum, and are usually in the form of a long band which was rolled for convenience about a rod. Greek manuscripts are in uncial, cursive, or minuscule characters. The uncials are the oldest form, and resemble modern capitals. The cursive characters are derived from the uncials, though they came to differ much from these in shape, and are used in manuscripts from the second century before Christ. The minuscule writing is that practised with few or no exceptions since the ninth century; the forms of the earliest printed Greek closely resemble it. Latin manuscripts are in capital, uncial, cursive, or minuscule characters. The capitals are the earliest form, but their use was not entirely discontinued until the Carolingian epoch. The uncials, of which the letters are characterized by their rounded shape, were developed very early, attained their highest perfection in the fourth century, and continued in use until the ninth century. The cursive writing was developed from the uncial; it appears in the graffiti found scratched on the walls of Pompeii, Rome, etc., and is the parent of many old systems of writing, as the Lombard and Merovingian. The minuscule style was developed in the eighth century, in the monastery of St. Martin at Tours, and reached its perfection in the twelfth century. In this style are written the splendid manuscripts of the middle ages, produced for the most part in monasteries, and enriched with superbly illuminated initial letters and elaborately painted miniatures. Upon the introduction of printing, the minuscule writing supplied models to the earliest type-makers. Palimpsest manuscripts are manuscripts written in antiquity or in the early middle ages upon papyrus or vellum from which earlier writing had been erased. Modern science has been successful in deciphering the imperfectly effaced characters of many such manuscripts, and has recovered in this way some of our most valuable remnants of classic literature. The three most important Biblical manuscripts extant are the Alexandrian Codex, the Vatican Codex, and the Sinaitic Codex. (See codex.) These are of course all uncials. See *capital*¹, cursive, majuscule, minuscule, uncial. Often abbreviated MS., plural MSS.

manuscript (man'ū-skript), v. t. [< manuscript, n.] To write by hand. [Rare.]

Being or consisting of a large number of units or individuals; numerous: often used alone, the noun being understood. See *many*¹, n.

To Winchestre and to Wych ich wente to the feire,
With mony maner marchaundise as my mayster hihte.
Piers Plowman (A), v. 120.

Many are the afflictions of the righteous. Ps. xxxiv. 19.

For many shall come in my name, . . . and shall deceive many. Mat. xxiv. 5.

He is not the best wright that hewes the maniest speals.
Ray, Proverbs (2d ed., 1678), p. 369.

Evadne. Is there none else here?
Melantius. None but a fearful conscience; that's too many.
Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv. 1.

2. Being one of a large number; belonging to an aggregate or category, considered singly as one of a kind: followed by a, an, or another, used distributively. The phrase many a one, so used, was formerly many one without the article.

I've met wi' mony a gentle knicht,
That gae me sic a fill.
King Henry (Child's Ballads, I. 151).

Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear.
Gray, Elegy.

So she, like many another babbler, hurt
Whom she would soothe. Tennyson, Guinevere.

3. Being of a certain number, large or small; plural (especially in the phrase the many as opposed to the one): after a term of qualification (as, so, too, and especially how in interrogations): often with the qualified noun omitted: as, how many people were there? how many will go? as many as the room will hold; not so many as before; too many men are dishonest.

Behold how many things they witness against thee.
Mark xv. 4.

Dost thou conjure for wenches, that thou call'st for such store,
When one is one too many? Shak., C. of E., iii. 1. 35.

The Greek will drink as many Glasses as there be Letters in his Mistress s name. Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

4. Much. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] —Many one†. See def. 2.

Anthony, the full noble souerayn,
Off paynyms hath ryght manyon slain.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 2275.

Not many, not much. [Slang.] —So many. (a) Such a number or an equal number of: as, packed together like so many herrings.

All so many as his menne mighten areche.
Alisaunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 441.

The women of the place had fled, like so many frighted deer, to one of the principal churches.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 11.

(b) Such a number indefinitely or distributively: as, he took so many of these, and so many of those, and so many of the others. —Too many, too strong; too powerful; too able: as, they are too many for us; he is too many, or one too many, for us. [Colloq.] [Many is prefixed to a great number of participial adjectives, forming compounds which explain themselves: as, many-armed, many-colored, many-cornered, many-eyed.] —Syn. 1. Manifold, multiplied, various, divers, sundry, frequent.

many[1] (men'i), n. [< ME. *manye, menye, < AS. menigu, mænigeo, manigu (= OS. menigi = MLG. menige, menie, menje = OHG. managī, manakī, menigī, menikī, MHG. menege, G. menge = Icel. mengi = Sw. mängd = Dan. mængde = Goth. managei), a crowd, many persons, < manig, many: see many[1], a. Many, n., is thus not merely the adj. used as a noun, but was formed from the adj. in early times, with a suffix now lost. Many[1] in the sense of 'crowd' became confused with many[2], menye, meiny, a retinue of servants: see meiny. In the collective use the noun many[1], with the def. art., is not easily distinguished from the adj. many[1] used in the plural as a noun.] 1. A multitude; a great aggregate; specifically, the mass of people; the generality; the common herd.

O thou fond many, with what loud applause
Did'st thou beat heaven with blessing Bolingbroke!
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 3. 91.

The will of the many, and their interest, must very often differ. Burke, Rev. in France.

2. A considerable number: with the indefinite article, and followed by of expressed or understood.

A many of us were called together before him, to say our minds in certain matters.
Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Like a many of these lisping hawthorn buds.
Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 3. 77.

They have not shed a many tears,
Dear eyes, since first I knew them well.
Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

[The phrase a many (as well as a pretty many) is now rare or colloquial; yet a good many and a great many are still in common use.]

manyberry (men'i-ber''i), n. Same as hackberry.

many-folded (men'i-fōl''ded), a. Having many folds, doublings, or complications.

His puissant armes about his noble brest,
And many-folded shield he bound about his wrest.
Spenser, F. Q., II. iii. 1.

many-headed (men'i-hed''ed), a. Having many heads. Applied to mythological beings fabled to have a number of heads on a single body, and in literature referring especially to the Lernæan hydra, called the many-headed monster: a phrase hence sometimes used of an excited mob or the mass of the common people, considered as one body moved by many furious or irrational impulses.

So, with this bold opposer rushes on This many-headed monster, multitude.
Daniel, Civil Wars, ii.

manyness (men'i-nes), n. The state or quality of being many in number; numerousness; multiplicity. Mind, XLI. 60. [Rare.]

manyplies (men'i-plīz), n. sing. and pl. [Also maniplies and (Sc.) moniplies; < many[1] + ply, n.] The third stomach of a ruminant, technically named the omasum or psalterium: so called from the many parallel folds or layers like the leaves of a book.

manyroot (men'i-röt), n. A plant, Ruellia tuberosa, found in Texas, Mexico, the West Indies, and in other localities. Its flowers are large and blue, and its tuberous roots have emetic properties.

many-sided (men'i-sī''ded), a. Having many sides; hence, figuratively, having many aspects, qualities, or capabilities; of diversified range or scope; not narrowly limited.

The Bishop of Cyrene . . . was one of those many-sided, volatile, restless men who taste joy and sorrow . . . abundantly and passionately. Kingsley, Hypatia, xxi.

many-sidedness (men'i-sī''ded-nes), n. The condition of having many sides; hence, figuratively, the quality of being many-sided; diversity of character or capability; wideness of range or view.

manywise, manyways (men'i-wīz, -wāz), adv. In many different ways; multifariously; variously.

Manzanilla (man-za-nil'ä), n. [Sp., perhaps so called from a town near Seville.] Sherry of unusually dry and light character; specifically, a sherry produced in the district of San Lucar de Barrameda in Spain.

manzanita (man-za-nē'tä), n. [Sp., dim. of manzana, apple.] One of several shrubs or small trees of the genus Arctostaphylos, found in the western United States. These are, especially, A. tomentosa, a shrub from 2 to 6 feet high; A. pungens, the most common manzanita, abounding everywhere on dry ridges, whether on the coast or at great elevations; and A. glauca, the great-berried manzanita, distinguished by its larger solid fruit, with a large five-celled stone.

maor (mär), n. [Gael. maor, maer, a steward, perhaps < ML. major, a steward, etc.: see major, mayor.] Anciently, in Scotland, a steward of crown or fiscal lands, whose rank afterward ★became that of a thane. See maormor.

Maori (mä'ō-ri or mou'ri), n. and a. [< Maori, lit. 'native,' 'indigenous.'] I. n. 1. One of the primitive inhabitants of New Zealand, a Polynesian tribe, distinguished for their natural capacity and vigor. Most of them now profess Christianity, but they have vigorously though unsuccessfully resisted English dominion. — 2. The language of the Maoris.

II. a. Of or belonging to the primitive inhabitants of New Zealand, or to their language. —Maori rat. See rat.

maormor (mär'mōr), n. [Gael., < maor, maer, a steward, + mor, great.] Anciently, in Scotland, a royal steward of high dignity and power, placed over a province instead of a thanage. After the introduction of feudalism the maormors became earls. Also written mormaer.

As to the office of Mormaer, there seems little doubt that, like the Maor, he was a royal official resembling the "Graphio" amongst the early Franks, and the Scandinavian "Jarl," acting as a royal deputy, and retaining in early times the third part of the royal revenue and prerogatives. Book of Deer.

Maoutia (mā-ö'ti-ä), n. [NL. (Weddell, 1854), named after E. Lemaout, a French botanist.] A genus of urticaceous plants, belonging to the tribe Bœhmerieæ. It is characterized by the minuteness or absence of the perianth in the female flowers, by flowers borne in small panicled heads, and by tufted or plumose stigmas. There are 8 species, natives of eastern India, the Malay archipelago, and the South Pacific islands. They are shrubs with alternate petioled leaves that are sometimes three-nerved and crenate; the flowers are small, disposed in little heads, generally in the axils of the leaves, sometimes terminal. See grass-cloth and ★pooa.

map[1] (map), n. [Early mod. E. mappe, < OF. (also F.) mappe = Sp. mapa = Pg. mappa, mapa, a map, = It. mappa, a map, prop., as in OF. F. It., a napkin, = D. map, mappe, map, portfolio, = G. Dan. mappe, portfolio; < L. mappa, a napkin, table-cloth, a cloth or handkerchief to give the signal in racing; said to be of Punic origin. Hence ML. mappa mundi (> OF. mappemonde, > ME. mappemounde, q. v.), a map of the world, a map being compared, with regard to its folding or to its being spread out on a table, to a napkin or table-cloth. The L. mappa became corrupted in ML. to napa, > ult. E. napery, napkin, and napron, apron, q. v.] 1. A drawing upon a plane surface representing a part or the whole of the earth's surface or of the heavens, every point of the drawing corresponding to some geographical or celestial position, according to some law, of perspective, etc., which is called the projection, or, better, the map-projection. See projection. A map of the earth, or of a part of the earth, frequently exhibits merely the positions of countries, mountains, rivers, lakes, cities, etc., relatively to one another, and, by means of lines of latitude and longitude, relatively to every other point on the earth's surface. Maps may be so colored or shaded as to give a variety of information: for example, to indicate the geological structure, the amount of rainfall, the principal productions, or the languages spoken. There are thus geological, meteorological, linguistic, faunal, and other kinds of maps. In maps on a large scale, or those which are the result of careful topographical surveys, the relief of the surface is generally indicated with more or less accuracy. This is done either by contour-lines or hachures, or by simple shading. By the latter method, as ordinarily practised, the indications of the relief of the surface are but rough in character. With sufficiently accurate data and a careful and artistic treatment, a close approach may, however, in this way be made to the effect obtained by photographing a model of the surface in question in an oblique light. From such a photograph the eye gets at once a very clear idea of the character of the surface.

Peering in maps for ports and piers and roads.
Shak., M. of V., i. 1. 19.

2. Figuratively, a distinct and precise representation of anything.

A liuely mappe of the deadly and damnable state of sinne and sinners (without Christ).

Also called swamp-maple, water-maple. —Rock-maple. Same as sugar-maple. —Silver or white maple, Acer saccharinum, a graceful fast-growing tree of good size, with sharply cut leaves, silvery beneath. It grows wild in eastern North America, and is also much cultivated for shade and ornament. —Soft maple, either the red or the silver maple. —Striped maple, Acer Pennsylvanicum, a small slender tree, the bark light green striped with brown or black, and sometimes also with white. Also called goose-foot maple, moose-wood. —Sugar-maple, Acer saccharum, a tree of great economic value, ranging from southern Newfoundland through the eastern half of the United States. Its heavy, hard, and tough wood is employed for furniture, shoe-lasts, inside finish, flooring, certain parts of ship-building, cabinet-work (especially in its curled and bird's-eye varieties), and numerous similar purposes. The sap of the living tree is drawn in early spring by tapping for the manufacture of a finely flavored sugar and syrup. Also called rock-maple, sugar-tree. — Swamp-maple. Same as red maple. —Sycamore maple, or simply sycamore, a name in England of Acer Pseudo platanus, a handsome tree of the mountains of central Europe and western Asia, frequently planted. Its wood is valued for fuel, domestic utensils, etc. —Vine-maple, Acer circinatum, a small tree found from Oregon to British Columbia, the stems often prostrate and forming dense thickets.

II. a. Consisting or made of, or derived from, maple or the maple-tree.

marant (mar′ant), n. [< Maranta.] In Lindley's system, a plant of the family Marantaceæ.

Maranta (ma-ran′tä), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after B. Maranta, a Venosan physician and botanist of the 16th century.] 1. A genus of monocotyledonous plants, type of the family Marantaceæ and tribe Marantæ. It is distinguished by the one-celled ovary, the slender-branched inflorescence, and the narrow involute bracts, closely surrounding the branches. They are herbaceous plants with fleshy tubers, sheathing leaves, and a few-flowered inflorescence, the flowers having a cylindrical corolla-tube, and a petaloid filament bearing a one-celled anther. There are about 15 species, indigenous to tropical America, but several species are widely cultivated for their fleshy tubers. The pure kind of starch known as arrowroot is obtained from the tubers of M. arundinacea and of several other species, by maceration, washing, and drying. (See arrowroot.) Several species have ornamental foliage. The zebra-plant, Calathea zebrina, whose leaves are 2 feet long and 6 inches wide, of a deep rich green, purple-shaded, and with a velvety appearance, has been referred to this genus by some authors. See also iturite-fiber.
2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

Marantaceæ (mar-an-tā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), < Maranta + -aceæ.] A family of monocotyledonous plants, typified by the genus Maranta, and embracing 12 genera, chiefly tropical. Calathea is the largest genus.

marantaceous (mar-an-tā′shius), a. Belonging to, or resembling, plants of the family Marantaceæ.

Maranteæ (ma-ran′tē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Maranta + -eæ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants belonging to the family Marantaceæ. The cells of the ovary have but one ovule, and the embryo is much curved. The tribe embraces 6 genera, of which Maranta is the type, and about 63 species, all natives of the tropics.

marast, n. An obsolete form of marish.

marasca (ma-ras′kä), n. [< It. marasca, amarasca, a black, hard, sour cherry, egriot (marasco, amarasco, the tree), marasca, amarasca, cherry-wine, < amaro, bitter, sour, < L. amarus, bitter.] A small black wild cherry, a variety of Prunus avium, from which maraschino is distilled.

maraschino (mar-as-kē′nō), n. [Also marasquino (< Sp. Pg. marasquino) and marasquin (< F. marasquin); < It. maraschino, < marasca, a kind of cherry: see marasca.] A cordial originating in Dalmatia, where it is distilled from or flavored with the marasca cherry, peculiar to that region; hence, a similar cordial produced in other regions from other kinds of cherry. The finest bears the name of maraschino of Zara, in which town it is reputed to be manufactured.

marasmic (ma-raz′mik), a. [< marasm(us) + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to marasmus; affected with marasmus: as, a marasmic tendency; a marasmic patient.

Marasmius (ma-ras′mi-us), n. [NL. (Fries, 1836–8), < Gr. μαρασμός, a wasting, withering, from the fact that the species are not putrescent, but dry or wither up with drought.] A large genus of agaricinous fungi, having a tough leathery pileus, which dries up with drought and is revived again on the application of water. The spores are white, and subelliptical in shape. About 450 species have been described, of which number some are edible. M. Oreades is the English champignon or fairy-ring mushroom. See champignon.

marasmoid (ma-raz′moid), a. [< marasm(us) + -oid.] Resembling or affected with marasmus.

marasmus (ma-raz′mus), n. [= F. marasme = Sp. Pg. It. marasmo, < NL. marasmus, < Gr. μαρασμός, a wasting, withering, decay, < μαραίνειν, put out, quench, weaken, cause to pine or waste away.] In pathol., a wasting of the flesh. The term is usually restricted to cases in which the cause of the wasting is obscure.

Pining atrophy,
Marasmus, and wide wasting pestilence.
Milton, P. L., xi. 487.

Marasmus senilis, progressive atrophy of the aged.

marasquino, n. See maraschino.

marasset, n. An obsolete form of marish.

Marathi (ma-rä′thi), n. [Marathi Marāthi.] The language of the Mahrattas. Also written Mahratti. See Mahratta.

Marathonian (mar-ạ-thō′ni-ạn), a. and n. [< L. Marathon, < Gr. Μαραθών, Marathon (see def.) (prob. so called from being overgrown with fennel, < μάραθον, μάραθος, μάραθρον, > L. marathrum, fennel), + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Marathon in Attica, the site of the famous battle in which the Athenians and Platæans overthrew the Persians in 490 B. C.: as, the Marathonian bull overcome by Theseus; the Marathonian mound or tumulus (the burial-place of the Greeks killed in the battle, still existing).

II. n. Same as Macedonian, 2.

Marattia (ma-rat′i-ạ), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1806), named after J. F. Maratti of Vallombrosa in Tuscany, a writer on ferns.] A genus of ferns, typical of the family Marattiaceæ. They are coarse-habited plants, having large scaly rhizomes and ample twice- or thrice-pinnate fronds, with oblong pinnules, bearing the sori in lines near the margin. Many fossil ferns showing both fronds and fructification closely resembling those of this genus occur from the Lower Jurassic (Rhætic) to the Eocene, chiefly in Europe but some species in India. The more ancient of these forms are commonly referred to an extinct ancestral genus Marattiopsis. Schimper united with that genus all the forms which had been called Angiopteridium.

Marattiaceæ (ma-rat-i-ā′ṣē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kaulfuss, 1824), < Marattia + -aceæ.] A family of eusporangiate ferns, typified by the genus Marattia. They are widely distributed in the tropics of both hemispheres. They differ from the true ferns on the one hand by the absence of the jointed ring of the spore-case, and from the Ophioglossaceæ on the other by the circinate vernation. They constitute an order, the Marattiales, of equal rank with the leptosporangiate ferns and the Ophioglossales.

maraud (mạ-râd′), v. i. [< F. marauder, play the rogue, go about begging or pilfering, < maraud, a rogue, knave, scoundrel; origin uncertain; perhaps, with suffix -aud, -old, < OF. marir, marrir, lose one's way, stray, etc., tr. hinder, annoy: see mar[1], v.] To rove in quest of plunder; make an excursion for booty; go about for robbery: used especially of the despoiling action of soldiers in time of war, or of organized bands of robbers or pirates.

> But war 's the Borderers' game.
> Their gain, their glory, their delight,
> To sleep the day, maraud the night.

maraud (mạ-râd′), n. [< maraud, v.] Spoliation by marauders. [Rare.]

> While it would expose the whole extent of the surrounding country to maraud and ravage. Irving.

marauder (mạ-râ′dėr), n. One who marauds; a rover in quest of booty or plunder; a plunderer; especially, one of a number of soldiers or of an organized band engaged in spoliation.

> Joining a corsair's crew,
> O'er the dark sea I flew
> With the marauders.
> Longfellow, Skeleton in Armor, vi.

=Syn. Freebooter, etc. See robber.

maravedi (mar-ạ-vā′di, as Sp. mä-rä-vā-dē′), n. [= F. maravedi, < Sp. maravedí (= Pg. maravedim), also morabitino (= Pg. marabitino), a coin so called, < Ar. Murābitīn, the name of a Moorish dynasty (Sp., with the Ar. art., Almoravides) which reigned in Spain at the close of the 11th and in the first half of the 12th century, during which time the coin was first struck at Cordova; pl. of morābit, a hermit, marabout: see Marabout[1].] 1. the Moorish dynasty of Almoravides in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. It weighed about 60 grains.—2. In later times, the smallest denomination of Spanish money, varying in value from a little less to a little more than half an English farthing or quarter of a United States cent. As a copper coin the maravedi circulated till the end of the eighteenth century; as a money of account it was abolished in 1848.—Not worth a maravedi, worthless.

maray, n. Same as moray.

marble (mär′bl), n. and a. [< ME. marble, marbil, marbelle, marbulle, merbyl, also marbre, < OF. marble, marbre, F. marbre = Pr. marme, marbre = Sp. mármol = Pg. marmore = It. marmo = AS. marmar(-stān), marman(-stān) = D. marmer, marmel = OHG. marmul, MHG. marmel, mermel, G. marmel, also märmel, murmel, marmor = Icel. marmari = Sw. Limestone in a more or less crystalline or crystalline-granular condition. Any limestone, however, even if very compact or showing only traces of a crystalline structure, may be called marble if it is capable of taking a polish, or if it is suitable or desirable for ornamental and decorative purposes. The presence of magnesium carbonate associated with the calcium carbonate, forming dolomitic limestone or even pure dolomite, does not in any way influence the nomenclature of the rock; indeed, such presence cannot usually be known except from chemical analysis. Marble is a material of great importance in architecture, not only for exterior use, but for interior decoration in large, costly monumental structures. Thirty-three varieties of ornamental stone are used in the interior of the Grand Opera House in Paris, and a large proportion of these may be classed as marbles. The value and beauty of marble depend largely on its coloration. Perfectly pure carbonate of lime, dolomitic limestone, and dolomite are all colorless, and white marbles—or at least such as are only slightly tinged with color—are very abundant. White marble such as is used for statuary (for which purpose it must be obtained in large blocks free from flaws or defects of any kind, and perfectly uniform in tint) is extremely rare. Among the finest statuary-marbles are those used in the masterpieces of Greek sculpture, of which that from the island of Paros is generally admitted to surpass all others, especially in the possession of a certain amount of translucence by which the artistic effect of the work is heightened. The Parian quarries seem, however, to have been practically exhausted. The Pentelican marble, obtained from quarries near Athens, stood next to the Parian in ancient times, and its quarries are still apparently inexhaustible. At the present time the artistic world is supplied with statuary-marble from quarries in the Apennine mountains overlooking the Bay of Spezia, and in the vicinity of Carrara, Massa, and Serravezza. From this marble were carved the finest works of Michelangelo. These quarries, which have been extensively worked for 2,000 years, furnish, in addition to the white, a large amount of variegated marble, especially of the variety known as bardiglio. The number and variety of colored and variegated marbles used for various artistic and architectural purposes is very great. Entirely black marble capable of taking a fine polish is rare; much more common are varieties irregularly shaded with gray, bluish-gray, or dove-colored tints. Bright colors—red, yellow, green, and blue—are much rarer than the less brilliant shades, but they are seen in some marbles, and are occasionally so blended and interbanded as to produce extremely beautiful effects. These brilliant colorations are chiefly due to the presence of iron in various combinations; dark and grayish shades are generally caused by the presence of a greater or less amount of organic matter. In many varieties of marble the presence of organic remains embedded in the rock adds greatly to its attractiveness. Joints and stems of encrinites, as well as many other kinds of fossils, occur in this way, and by contrast of their color with that of the material in which they are inclosed, as well as by the gracefulness of their forms, produce a very fine effect. Fragments of shells embedded in calcareous rocks sometimes exhibit a brilliant display of iridescent coloration: such marbles are known as lumachelles, or, sometimes, fire-marbles. A beautiful effect is occasionally produced as the result of deposition of the calcareous material in stalagmitic form, so that when cut and polished the marble exhibits concentric zones of various tints; varieties having this structure are frequently called onyx marble. The vicinity of the Mediterranean is the classic region of marbles. Italy, France, and Spain are rich in beautiful varieties, and these are seen in the greatest number and to the best advantage in the architectural works of ancient and modern Rome. For this reason many of the rarest and most attractive marbles are best known by Italian names, and these names are frequently applied to varieties occurring far away from the Mediterranean, from either real or fancied similarity to the Italian marbles. Some of the best-known and most highly prized classic variegated marbles are the following. Africano, from the island of Chios, is a lumachelle, or shell-marble, exhibiting a great variety and brilliancy of coloration, reddish and purplish tints predominating. Bardiglio is common in the Apennine quarries, of a grayish- or bluish-white color, traversed by darker veins of the same. Brocatel and brocatellone are extremely variegated marbles, with numerous interlacing veins of yellow, violet, and crimson tints, on a yellowish ground; marble bearing these designations has been and still is quarried in various places, and especially near Tortosa in Spain. Cipollino is a marble with more or less of a concretionary structure, of many tints and much variety in their arrangement, with corresponding names, such as cipollino verde, mandorlato (having almond-shaped patches of color), rosso, etc.; a fine example of this marble may be seen in the columns of the Braccio Nuovo of the Vatican. Fior di persico is an exquisitely beautiful marble, with a reddish and crimson shading on a white base: called by the ancients marmor Molossium, because coming from the region inhabited by the Molossi, in what is now Albania, on the eastern coast of the Adriatic. Giallo antico or Numidian marble is an extremely beautiful marble quarried in northern Africa; it was highly esteemed and extensively used by the Romans. The tints are variable, red and yellow predominating; the different varieties were designated by names indicating the prevailing tints. Giallo di Siena is a beautiful yellow marble of various depths of color, with darker veins, in which violet hues predominate: when these veins are very numerous the marble becomes a brocatel. Pavonazzo and pavonazetto are various red and purplish marbles and breccias, some of the latter being also true marbles, but having a more or less brecciated character. The most beautiful pavonazetto is that called by the Romans marmor Synadicum or Phrygian marble, from the locality where it was obtained; it is characterized by a very irregular venation of dark-red with bluish and yellowish tints, ramifying through a translucent alabaster-like base, which is sometimes almost opaline in its play of colors. Rosso antico is a marble of very deep red color, sometimes of various shades, occasionally streaked or clouded with dark-purple or whitish tints. The original locality of the classic rosso antico has not been discovered, but some modern red marbles closely resemble this variety. Some of the most highly prized French colored marbles bear names peculiar to France. (See griotte, portor, sarrancolin.) The Devonian and Carboniferous of England and Ireland furnish a considerable number of ornamental marbles. Devonshire and Derbyshire are the counties in which the best-known English varieties are obtained. The finest Irish variegated marbles are quarried near Armagh, and at various localities in county Cork, also at Killarney, and on the islands of the Kenmare river; and marble called Siena is obtained from several places in King's county and near Shannon Harbor in Galway. The most important quarries of white and grayish marble in the United States are those in the Lower Silurian of Vermont and western Massachusetts. There are very extensive marble-works at Rutland in Vermont, at Lee in Massachusetts, and at many other points in the same geological formation. Some of the variegated marbles found on the islands and near the shores of Lake Champlain are very handsome, but they are not extensively worked. The most popular colored marble in the United States at the present time is the Tennessee, a light-grayish stone beautifully mottled with shades of pinkish red. This marble has been extensively employed in the capitols at Washington and Albany.

2. A piece of sculptured or inscribed marble, especially if having some interest as an object of study or curiosity, and more particularly if ancient; any work of art in marble: as, the Elgin marbles.—3. A little ball of marble or other stone, or of baked clay, porcelain, or glass, used by children in play; an alley.—4. In glass-blowing, a block or thick piece of wood in which are formed hemispherical concavities, used in the manufacture of flasks, etc., to shape the fused glass gathered upon the end of the glass-blower's pipe into an approximately spherical form by pressing and turning it over in the concavities preparatory to the blowing. See marver. [In this sense improperly spelled marbel.]—5†. Marble-silk.

See Æginetan.—Artificial marble, a composition of alum, gypsum, isinglass, and coloring materials worked into a paste, molded into form, and allowed to harden.—Arundel marbles, or Arundelian marbles, also known as the Oxford marbles, a collection of ancient sculptures, inscriptions, and other antiquities, purchased by Sir William Petty at Smyrna in 1624 for the Earl of Arundel, whose grandson, at the instance of Evelyn, presented a portion of it to the University of Oxford. The most valuable object in this collection is the inscribed slab called the Parian Chronicle, from having been kept in the island of Paros. In its perfect state, the inscription contained a chronicle of the principal events in Grecian history from the time of the mythical Cecrops to the archonship of Diognetus (264 B. C.); but the part of it covering the last ninety years is now lost, and much of what remains is corroded and defaced.—Elgin marbles, a collection of ancient sculptures, for the most part of the school of Phidias and from the Parthenon at Athens, taken to England during the first years of the nineteenth century by the Earl of Elgin, and now preserved in the British Museum. These sculptures are the finest surviving work of ancient artists, and comprise the greatest part now in existence of the sculptured decoration of the Parthenon, including the splendid fragments of the pediment statues, a great number of metopes, and an extended series of the blocks carved in low relief of the cella frieze. The removal of the marbles, many of which were torn violently from their original positions upon the Parthenon, to the further damage of that monument, was in itself an act of vandalism; but their transportation to England at a time when Greece was accessible with difficulty opened the eyes of the world to the preëminence of Greek work. It was one of the first steps toward securing an accurate knowledge of Hellenic ideals, and has thus influenced contemporary civilization.—Entrochal marble. See entrochal.—Hymettian marble. See Hymettian.—Kilkenny marble, a variety of fine black marble containing shells, much used for mantelpieces.—Ligneous marble. See ligneous.—Madrepore marble. See madrepore.—Marezzo marble, an imitation of marble and other fine-veined stones in solid slabs, the base of which is cement.—Pergamene marbles, or Pergamum marbles, two series of sculptures in high relief and of an original type of Greek art, forming part of the decoration of the great altar of Zeus and Athena, erected at Pergamum by King Eumenes II. (197–159 B. C.) in commemoration of splendid victories over the invading Gauls. Abundant remains of these sculptures have been unearthed since 1875 by Karl Humann, and are now in the Berlin Museum. See Pergamene art, under Pergamene.—Petworth marble, also called Sussex marble (both names arising from its being worked at Petworth in Sussex), a variously colored limestone occurring in the Weald clay, containing the remains of fresh-water shells.

II. a. 1. Consisting of marble: as, a marble pillar.—2. Veined or stained like marble; variegated in color; marbled.

Marbleized glass. See glass.

marble-paste (mär'bl-pāst), n. A white porcellaneous paste used for figures, busts, and the like, especially at the factory of Lunéville in the eighteenth century.

marble-polisher (mär'bl-pol″ish-ėr), n. 1. (a) A block of sandstone used to rub a marble slab in the preliminary operation of polishing; also, a linen cushion with which the polishing is carried to completion by the agency of emery-dust or powder of calcined tin. (b) A marble-rubber.—2. A machine for polishing marble. Its chief element is a grinding-cylinder composed of several collars upon a mandrel. The slab of marble is placed on a table, and the cylinder, which is fed with the polishing-powder, rotates above it, with a longitudinally reciprocating motion as well as one of simple revolution. For columns a large lathe is used, the stone shaft being revolved in contact with rubbers held in the tool-rest. See marble-rubber.

marbler (mär'blėr), n. 1. One who works in marble; a quarrier or a cutter of marble.

> The charter . . . bears the date of 1551, though the marblers [of Purbeck in England] always persist that they possess an earlier one. Harper's Mag., LXX. 244.

2. One who stains or otherwise marks in imitation of marble; especially, one who marbles paper.

marble-rubber (mär'bl-rub″ėr), n. A rubber for "surfacing," smoothing, and polishing flat marble slabs. It consists of a flat sole with a superimposed tray having holes through which water and sand are supplied to the sole as needed. It is used with a combined reciprocating and rotary motion.

marble-saw (mär'bl-sâ), n. A machine for cutting marble. It consists of a single thin iron blade, or of several blades arranged in a gang, set in a frame, and reciprocated by pitmans and eccentrics. The blades are constantly fed with sand and water. Such machines will cut a block of marble into several slabs simultaneously, or can be arranged to cut out pyramidal blocks, or to shape a cylinder or a frustum of a cone.

marble-scourer (mär'bl-skour″ėr), n. An implement for scouring marble floors, constructed and acting on the same principle as the marble-rubber, but having a handle by which the workman, in a standing position, can conveniently operate it.

marble-silk (mär'bl-silk), n. A silk having a weft of several colors, so woven that the whole web looks like marble, stained or veined irregularly. D. Rock, S. K. Textiles.

marblet (mär'blet), n. [< marble + -et.] An iguanian lizard of South America, Polychrus marmoratus.

marble-thrush (mär'bl-thrush), n. The mistle-thrush: so called from its marbled breast. C. Swainson. [North Hants, Eng.]

marble-worker (mär'bl-wėr″kėr), n. One who works in marble; a workman who cuts, hews, or polishes marble; a marbler.—Marble-workers' file. See file[1].

marbling (mär'bling), n. [Verbal n. of marble, v.] 1. The art or process of variegating in color, in imitation of marble, or with veins and cloudings of any sort.—2. Any marking resembling that of veined or variegated marble; hence, any mottling, veining, or clouding of a surface: as, the marbling of flesh-meat caused by alternations of fat and lean.—3. The art or practice of staining paper or the cut edges of a book with variegated colors, usually in some conventional imitation of marble. It is done in a trough of water covered by a layer of gum tragacanth mixed with a little ox gall. The fluid colors are sprinkled or spattered over this layer with a brush, either in the arrangement intended for use or in a manner which will admit of producing the desired figuration by drawing a brass comb over the surface. The dampened paper, held by the ends, is lightly passed in a curve over this surface, taking up the colors, and finished by sizing and burnishing or calendering.

marbly (mär'bli), a. [< marble + -y[1].] Resembling marble in structure or appearance.

> Great smooth marbly limbs.
> Browning, The Bishop Orders his Tomb.

marcando (mär-kän'dō), a. [It., ppr. of marcare, mark: see mark[1], v.] In music, distinct and decisive: applied to single notes and passages, and sometimes to a whole movement, to be so rendered. Also marcato.

marcantant†, n. See mercatante.

marcasite (mär'ka-sīt), n. [Formerly also marcassite, marchasite, marchesite; < F. marcassite = Sp. marquesita = It. marcassita, marchesita; with term. -ite[2]; said to be of Ar. origin (?).] 1. As used by the early mineralogists, the crystallized forms of iron pyrites, including more particularly the isometric species now called pyrite. This mineral was frequently used for personal decoration in the eighteenth century. It takes a good polish, and is cut in facets like rose diamonds. It was made into pins, watch-cases, shoe- and knee-buckles, and other ornaments.

> Also great pieces of chrystal, amethysts, gold in ye mine, and other mettals and marcasites.
> Evelyn, Diary, June 21, 1650.
> Half the ladies of our acquaintance . . . carry their jewels to town, and bring nothing but paste and marcasites back. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, iii.

2. In recent use, the orthorhombic iron pyrites, or iron disulphid, FeS_2. It has a lower specific gravity than ordinary pyrite, and on an untarnished surface a somewhat paler color, in consequence of which it is often called white iron pyrites. The crystallized varieties take various imitative forms called cockscomb pyrites, spear pyrites, etc.; the massive kinds are often radiated, concretionary, etc. Marcasite is much more liable to alteration than ordinary pyrite, passing by oxidation into iron sulphate or copperas. The two kinds of iron pyrites often occur together, and the greater the proportion of marcasite the more the liability to alteration; this has been shown (Julien) to be an important element in the durability of building-stones containing pyrites.

marcasitic (mär-ka-sit'ik), a. [< marcasite + -ic.] Pertaining to marcasite; of the nature of marcasite.

marcasitical (mär-ka-sit'i-kal), a. [Formerly also marchasitical; < marcasitic + -al.] Same as marcasitic.

> The place that abounds with these marchasitical minerals. Boyle, Works, III. 333.

marcassin (mär'ka-sin), n. [< F. marcassin, a young wild boar, a grise.] In her., the young wild boar, used as a bearing. This bearing is distinguished from the boar by having the tail hanging down and not curled round in a ring.

marcato (mär-kä'tō), a. [It., pp. of marcare, mark: see marcando.] Same as marcando.

marceline[1] (mär'se-lin), n. [< F. marceline; so called from St. Marcel in Piedmont, where the original specimen was found.] In mineral., an altered form of rhodonite, or silicate of manganese, in which the manganese protoxid has been converted into sesquioxid.

marceline[2] (mär'se-lin), n. [Also marcelline; < F. marceline (a trade-name ?).] A thin silk fabric used for linings, etc., in women's costume.

Marcellian (mär-sel'i-an), a. and n. [< Marcellus (see def.) + -ian.] I. a. Pertaining to Marcellus of Ancyra in Asia Minor, or to his doctrines.

II. n. One of the professed followers of Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra in the fourth century. The Marcellians held the doctrine, nearly agreeing with that of the Sabellians, that the Holy Spirit and the Word, or Logos, are merely impersonal agencies and qualities of God, and that the incarnation of the Logos is temporary only. It has been doubted by some whether Marcellus held the views ascribed to him.

marcelline, n. See marceline[2].

Marcellinist (mär-se-lin'ist), n. [< Marcellina (see def.) + -ist.] An adherent of Marcellina, a female Gnostic of the second century, and a teacher of Gnosticism in Rome. Also Marcellinian.

Marcellus shale. [Named from the town of Marcellus, in New York.] The lowest division of the Middle Devonian, in the classification of the New York Geological Survey. It is a dark shale with calcareous beds and contains considerable carbonaceous matter.

marcescent (mär-ses'ent), a. [= F. marcescent, < L. marcescen(t-)s, ppr. of marcescere, wither, pine, fade, decay, inceptive of marcere, wither, droop, shrivel, be feeble or languid, faint.] Withering; fading; decaying. Specifically—(a) In bot., withering, but not falling off till the part bearing it is perfected: as, a marcescent perianth. (b) In entom., appearing shriveled or withered, as the spines on certain Hemiptera.

marcescible (mär-ses'i-bl), a. [= F. marcescible = Pg. marcescivel = It. marcescibile, < L. as if marcescibilis,* < marcescere, wither, fade: see marcescent.] That may wither; liable to decay; ephemeral; transient.

Marcgravia (märk-grā'vi-ä), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after Georg Marcgraf (17th century), who traveled in South America and wrote, with W. Pison, a work on the natural history of Brazil.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, type of the family Marcgraviaceæ (which see). The genus is peculiar in having the petals stuck together in a hood-like mass, numerous stamens, and sac-shaped bracts at the apex of the usually umbelliform spikes.

Marcgraviaceæ (märk-grā-vi-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jussieu, 1809), < Marcgravia + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, typified by the genus Marcgravia. It embraces 5 genera and 39 species of tropical American plants with imbricate or coherent hood-shaped petals, anthers fixed by the base, and numerous stamens. They are climbing or epiphytic woody plants, with flowers in terminal racemes, frequently intermixed with peculiar-shaped bracts.

Marcgravieæ (märk-grā-vī′ē-ē), n. pl. A former suborder of plants of the Marcgraviaceæ regarded as an order.

march[1] (märch), n. [< ME. marche, partly (a) < AS. mearc (gen. dat. mearce), border, bound, mark; partly (b) < OF. marche, F. marche (= Pr. Sp. Pg. It. marca, ML. marca), border, bound, frontier, the Rom. forms being from the OHG. cognate with AS. mearc: see further under mark[1], n.] A frontier or boundary of a territory; a border; hence, a borderland; a district or political division of a country conterminous with the boundary-line of another country. In Scotland the term is commonly applied to the boundaries, or the marks which determine the boundaries, of conterminous estates or lands, whether large or small. The word is most familiar historically with reference to the boundaries between England and Wales and between England and Scotland. The latter were divided into two parts, the western and the middle marches, each of which had courts peculiar to itself, and a kind of president or governor, who was called warden of the marches. See mark[1], 13.

Also fro the dede See, to gon Estward out of the Marches of the Holy Lond, . . . is a strong Castelle and a fair.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 104.

For in the marches here we heard you were,
Making another head to fight again.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 140.

These low and barren tracts were the outlying marches of the empire. Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 18.

Riding the marches, a ceremony in which the magistrates and chief men of a municipality ride on horseback in procession along the boundaries of the property of the corporation: a practice still observed occasionally in some of the burghs of Scotland, the original object of which was to preserve in the memory of the inhabitants the limits of their property.

march[1] (märch), v. i. [< ME. marchen, also marken, merken, < AS. mearcian, fix the bounds or limits of a place, < mearc, border, bound, mark: see mark[1], v., and cf. march[1], n.] 1. To constitute a march or border; be bordering; lie continuously parallel and contiguous; abut.

He may, zif that he wole, go thorghe Almayne, and thorghe the Kyngdom of Hungarye, that marchethe to the Lond of Polayne. Mandeville, Travels, p. 6.

Of al the Inhabitants of this Isle, the Kentish men are most ciuilest, the which country marcheth altogether vpon the sea. Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 247.

You must not quarrel with the man whose estates march with your own. Mrs. Oliphant, The Ladies Lindores, p. 40.

2. To dwell adjacent; neighbor.

She displayed so much kindness to Jeanie Deans (because she herself, being a Merse woman, marched with Mid-Lothian, in which Jeanie was born).
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxviii.

march[2] (märch), v. [< ME. marchen = D. marscheren = G. marschiren = Sw. marschera = Dan. marschere, < OF. marcher, F. marcher (> Sp. Pg. marchar = It. marciare), walk, march, proceed, move on; perhaps < OF. marche, border, frontier (see march[1], n.); according to another view, < ML. marcare*, hammer, hence beat the ground with the feet, tramp, march (< marcus, a hammer); cf. tramp, jog, pace one's beat, and similar expressions. Neither view is satisfactory.] I. intrans. 1. To walk with measured steps, or with a steady regular tread; move in a deliberate, stately manner; step with regularity, earnestness, or gravity: often used trivially, as in the expression, he marched off angrily.

When thou didst march through the wilderness, . . . the earth shook. Ps. lxviii. 7, 8.

So wrought this nimble Artist, and admir'd Herself to see the Work march on so fast.
Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 63.

2. Specifically, to walk with concerted steps in regular or measured time, as a body or a member of a body of soldiers or a procession; move in uniform order and time; step together in ranks.

Let our trains
March by us, that we may peruse the men
We should have coped withal.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 2. 93.

The great Achilles march'd not to the field
Till Vulcan that impenetrable shield
And arms had wrought.
Waller, Instructions to a Painter.

3. To move in military order, as a body of troops; advance in a soldierly manner: as, in the morning the regiment marched; they marched twenty miles.

This worthy chevalrie
All merchand to the field.
Battle of Balrinnes (Child's Ballads, VII. 224).

Heavy marching order, light marching order. See heavy[1], light[2]. —Marching orders, orders to march.

The Duke 's in Belgium already, and we expect marching orders every day. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xx.

Marching regiment, in Great Britain, an infantry regiment of the line: generally used in a disparaging sense. —To march to the length of †. See length.

II. trans. 1. To cause to move in military order, or in a body or regular procession: as, to march an army to the battle-field.

On the marriage-bed
Of smiling peace to march a bloody host.
Shak., K. John, iii. 1. 246.

2. To cause to go anywhere at one's command and under one's guidance: as, the policeman marched his prisoner to the lockup.

march[2] (märch), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. marsch, < F. marche = Sp. Pg. marcha = It. marcia, walk, gait, march; from the verb.] 1. A measured and uniform walk or concerted and orderly movement of a body of men, as soldiers; a regular advance of a body of men, in which they keep time with each other and sometimes with music; stately and deliberate walk; steady or labored progression: used figuratively in regard to poetry, from its rhythm resembling the measured harmonious stepping of soldiery.

Waller was smooth, but Dryden taught to join
The varying verse, the full resounding line,
The long majestic march and energy divine.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 269.

2. An advance from one halting-place to another, as of a body of soldiers or travelers; the distance passed over in a single course of marching; a military journey of a body of troops: as, a march of twenty miles.

I have trod full many a march, sir,
And some hurts have to shew, before me too, sir.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, ii. 2.

Such stiff-neck'd abjects as with weary marches
Have travell'd from their homes, their wives, and children. Ford, Perkin Warbeck, iii. 1.

3. Progressive advancement; progress; regular course.

There methinks would be enjoyment more than in the march of mind. Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

4. A military signal to move, consisting of a particular drum-beat or bugle-call.

If drummes once sound a lustie martch indeede,
Then farewell bookes, for he will trudge with speede.
Gascoigne, Fruits of War.

5. In music, a strongly rhythmical composition designed to accompany marching or to imitate a march-movement. The rhythm is usually duple, but it may be triply compound. Marches generally consist of two contrasted sections, the second of which (commonly called the trio) is softer and more flowing than the first, and is followed by a repetition of the first. Rapid marches are often called quicksteps or military marches. Slow marches are also called processional marches, and are further distinguished as funeral (or dead-), nuptial, triumphal, etc.

6. In weaving, one of the short laths placed across the treadles beneath the shafts of a loom. E. H. Knight.—7. In the game of euchre, a taking of all five tricks by one side.—Flank march. See flank[1].—Forced march, a march vigorously pressed in certain emergencies in time of war, as to effect a rapid concentration of troops or a strategical combination. It is exhausting to even the best troops, and as a rule should not exceed thirty miles a day; special care is supposed to be taken to avoid such exhaustion just before going into action. The troops are relieved by changing the gaits, alternating the double with the quick time, and in the cavalry the horses are relieved for fifteen minutes every hour by the dismounting and marching of the men. Any distance over twenty miles a day is reckoned a forced march.—March past, the march of a body of soldiers in front of a reviewing officer or some high dignitary.

Between 2,000 and 3,000 troops mustered on the ground, and their march past was an event of the highest political significance. Marvin, Gates of Herat, iii.

Rogue's march, music played in derision to accompany the expulsion from a regiment of a soldier who is drummed out, or of any obnoxious person ignominiously expelled from a community.—To steal a march. See steal.

March[3] (märch), n. [< ME. March, Marche, Mershe, Marz, < OF. march, mars, F. mars = Pr. mars, martz = Sp. marzo = Pg. março = It. marzo = D. Maart = MLG. Mertze, Merce, Merse, Martze, LG. Merte = OHG. Merzo, Marcëo, MHG. Merze, G. März = Sw. Mars = Dan. Marts = OBulg. marŭtŭ, Bulg. mart = Serv. marach, mrach = Pol. marzec = Little Russ. marec = Gr. Μάρτιος, < L. Martius, sc. mensis, March, lit. the month of Mars, < Mars (Mart-), Mars: see Mars, martial, etc.] The third month of our year, consisting of thirty-one days. It was the first month of the ancient Roman year till the adoption of the Julian calendar, which was followed by the Gregorian; previous to the latter it was reckoned the first month in many European countries, and so continued in England till 1752, the legal year there before that date beginning on the 25th of March.—Mad as a March hare. See hare[1].—March ale, ale brewed in March.—March beer, beer brewed in the month of March. Spring and autumn were considered the best seasons for brewing; hence, beer for keeping was brewed when possible either in March or in October.—March meeting. See meeting.

He on his own fish pours the noblest oil; . . .
That, to your marcid dying herbs assigned,
By the rank smell and taste betrays its kind.
W. Bowles, in Dryden's tr. of Juvenal's Satires, v. 123.

2. Causing or accompanied by wasting and feebleness.

A burning colliquative fever, the softer parts being melted away, the heat continuing its adustion upon the drier and fleshy parts, changes into a marcid fever.
Harvey. (Latham.)

marcidity (mär-sid'i-ti), n. [< marcid + -ity.] A wasted or withered condition; leanness; meagerness.

Marcionist (mär'shon-ist), n. [< Gr. Μαρκιωνιστής, < Μαρκίων, Marcion: see Marcionite and -ist.] Same as Marcionite.

Marcionite (mär'shon-īt), n. and a. [< LL. Marcionita, < Gr. Μαρκιωνῖτης, < Μαρκίων, L. Marcion, < Μάρκος, L. Marcus, a personal name.] I. n. A follower of Marcion of Sinope, a Gnostic religious teacher of the second century, and the founder at Rome of the Marcionite sect, which lasted until the seventh century or later. Marcion taught that there were three primal forces: the good God, first revealed by Jesus Christ; the evil matter, ruled by the devil; and the Demiurge, the finite and imperfect God of the Jews. He rejected the Old Testament, denied the incarnation and resurrection, and admitted only a gospel akin to or altered from that of St. Luke and ten of St. Paul's epistles as inspired and authoritative; he repeated baptism thrice, excluded wine from the eucharist, inculcated an extreme asceticism, and allowed women to minister. See Cerdonian.

II. a. Pertaining to or characterized by the principles of Marcion: as, the Marcionite Church.

Marcionitic (mär-shon-nit'ik), a. [< Marcionite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Marcionites or their doctrines.

Marcobrunner (mär'kō-brūn-ėr), n. [G.] A wine produced in a vineyard in the commune of Erbach, near Wiesbaden, and taking its name from a neighboring fountain called the Markbrunnen. It ranks among the best of German wines.

Marcomannic (mär-kō-man'ik), a. [< Marcomanni + -ic.] Relating to the Marcomanni, an ancient German tribe which harassed the Roman empire at intervals from the time of Cæsar to the fourth century.

marcor, marcour (mär'kor), n. [< L. marcor, decay, faintness, languor, < marcere, wither, decay, fade, faint: see marcescent.] The state of withering or wasting; leanness; loss of flesh. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Marcosian (mär-kō'si-an), n. [Appar. irreg. < Gr. Μάρκος, L. Marcus, the name of the founder.] A follower of Marcus, perhaps of Ephesus, a heresiarch of the second century. The leading features of his system were a ritual imitating the Christian eucharist (at which he apparently caused a miraculous change in the color and quantity of the wine), ministration and prophecy of women, a cabalistic use of numbers and letters, antinomian licentiousness, and a Gnostic system of eons. He is known chiefly from the writings of Irenæus, and his followers were not numerous.

marcour, n. See marcor.

marder†, mardern†, n. Same as marten[1].

Mardi gras (mär'dē grä). [F., lit. 'fat Tuesday': so called from the French practice of parading a fat ox (bœuf gras) during the celebration of the day: mardi (< L. Martis dies, day of Mars), Tuesday; gras, fat: see grease.] Shrove Tuesday; the last day of carnival; the day before Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent), which in some places, as in New Orleans, is celebrated with revelry and elaborate display.

mare[1] (mār), n. [< ME. mare, mere, meere, mure, < AS. mere, myre = OFries. merie = D. merrie = MLG. Formerly also horse-nest.

Why dost thou laugh?
What mare's nest hast thou found?
Fletcher, Bonduca, v. 2.

It [the average German mind] finds its keenest pleasure in divining a profound significance in the most trifling things, and the number of mare's-nests that have been stared into by the German Gelehrter through his spectacles passes calculation.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 292.

Money makes the mare go, the outlay of money keeps things going; money will succeed where everything else fails. [Slang.]

I'm making the mare go here in Whitford, without the money too sometimes. Kingsley, Two Years Ago, Int.

Shanks' mare, one's own legs, as a means of conveyance. [Slang.]—The gray mare is the better horse, the wife rules the husband. [Slang.]—Timber mare. Same as horse[1], 5 (b).

mare[2]† (mār), n. [< ME. mare, mere, < AS. mara, an incubus, = MLG. mare, mār, LG. mare, mar, mor = OHG. maro, mar, MHG. mar, G. dial. mahr, mar = Icel. mara = Sw. mara = Dan. mare, nightmare; cf. OF. mare, an incubus, also in comp. cauchemare, cochemare, cauquemare, F. cauchemar, nightmare, < OF. caucher, < L. calcare, tread upon, + mare, incubus; cf. Pol. mora, a vision, dream, nightmare; Bohem. mura, incubus; prob. lit. 'crusher,' from the root of AS. mirran, myrran, hinder, mar, orig. 'crush': see mar[1].] Oppressed sleep; incubus, formerly regarded as an evil spirit of the night that oppresses persons during sleep: now used only in the compound nightmare.

Mushrooms cause the incubus, or the mare in the stomach. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

mare[3]†, a. and adv. An obsolete form of more[1].

Mareca (ma-rē'kä), n. [NL.: cf. Pg. marreca (fem.), widgeon; also given as a native Brazilian name.] A genus of ducks of the family Anatidæ and subfamily Anatinæ; the widgeons. The common widgeon of Europe is M. penelope; that of America is M. americana. See widgeon. Also written Marica.

marechal† (mar'e-shal), n. [F. maréchal, marshal: see marshal.] A kind of scent or perfume; also, a hair-powder perfumed with it.

His hair powdered with marechal, a cambric shirt, etc. Smollett, Roderick Random.

mare clausum (mā'rē klâ'sum). [L.: mare, sea; clausum, neut. of clausus, closed: see mere[1] and close[2], a.] A closed sea; a sea closed to navigation; a sea or a part of the high seas within the jurisdiction of a particular nation, as distinguished from the open sea, where all nations have equal right. The phrase is not a geographical one, but a technical legal term, the subject of which has always been in controversy in international law; and its meaning therefore varies in extent according as it is used by those who claim or who resist an extension of territorial jurisdiction over otherwise open seas.

mareist†, n. A Middle English form of marish.

marekanite (mar'ē-kan-īt), n. [< Marekanka (see def.) + -ite[2].] A variety of obsidian, found in small spherules in the vicinity of the Marekanka, near Okhotsk in Siberia. It is a form of rhyolitic perlite.

Maremmese (mar-e-mēs' or -mēz'), a. [< It. Maremme + -ese.] Of or pertaining to the Maremme, certain marshy tracts extending along the coast of Tuscany in Italy, reaching back from six to eighteen miles from the sea. The soil is of wonderful fertility, but malaria is so prevalent as to render these districts uninhabitable in the warm season.

marena (ma-rē'nä), n. [NL., < G. maräne, moräne, said to be so called from Lake Morin, in Brandenburg, Prussia.] A coregonine fish, Coregonus maræna, better known as C. lavaretus: same as lavaret.

marennin (ma-ren'in), n. See the quotation.

Navicula ostrearia contains a light-blue pigment, which it is proposed to call marennin, which is diffused throughout the protoplasm. Jour. of Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI. i. 53.

Mareotic (mar-ē-ot'ik), a. [< L. Mareoticus, < Gr. Μαρεωτικός, < Μαρεῶτις (sc. λίμνη), also Μάρεια, ἡ λίμνη ἡ Μαρία, Lake Mareotis, < Μάρεια, Μαρέη, < Egypt. Mer or Mir, a city in Egypt, or the lake Mareotis (see def.) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to Lake Mareotis in Lower Egypt, or the region in which it is situated: as, Mareotic wine.

mares, n. Plural of mas[3].

mareschal (mar'e-shal), n. An obsolete form of marshal: used archaically, especially with reference to a marshal of France.

O William, may thy arms advance,
That he may lose Dinant next year,
And so be mareschal [in ed. 1766, "constable"] of France.
Prior, Taking of Namur in 1695.

mare's-nest (mārz'nest), v. i. [< mare's nest (see under mare[1]).] To discover mare's nests; make absurd discoveries; imagine that one has made an important discovery which is really no discovery at all, or is a hoax.

He's always mare's-nesting.
Lever, Davenport Dunn, I. 206. (Hoppe.)

maresset†, n. A Middle English form of marish.

★mare's-tail (mãrz'tāl), n. and a. I. n. 1. (a) A plant of the genus Hippuris: most properly H. vulgaris. [In old herbals this was female horsetail, in contrast with Equisetum fluviatile, a stronger plant, called male horsetail. But later writers say mare's-tail, as if the meaning had been female-horse tail.] (b) The horsetail, Equisetum. See bottle-brush, 2.

The pretty marestail forest, fairy pines. Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

2. pl. Long straight fibers of gray cirrus cloud, an indication of the approach of stormy weather.

A light blue sky and a crescent of mare's-tails over the mastheads. W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xxii.

3. In anat., the cauda equina (which see, under cauda).

II. a. Like a mare's tail; of the kind called mare's-tails: said of clouds.

Streaks of marestail clouds in the sky. Huxley, Nineteenth Century, [XIX. 202.

Flowering Branch of Mare's-tail (Hippuris vulgaris). a, a flower before anthesis; b, a flower after anthesis; c, the fruit.

marewe†, n. An obsolete form of marrow[1].

Marezzo marble. See marble.

margarate (mär'gạ-rāt), n. [< margar(ic) + -ate[1].] In chem., a salt of margaric acid.

margaret (mär'gạ-ret), n. [< Margaret, a fem. name, = F. Marguerite = Sp. Pg. Margarita = It. Margarita, Margherita, < L. margarita, < Gr. μαργαρίτης, a pearl: see margarite. The name Margaret, reduced to Mag, Madge, dim. Maggie, etc., is familiarly applied to several birds, etc.: see madge[1], mag[1], magpie, etc.] Same as madge[1].

margaret-grunt (mär'gạ-ret-grunt), n. Same as margate-fish.

margaric (mär-gar'ik), a. [< margar(ite) + -ic.] Pertaining to or resembling pearl.—Margaric acid, $C_{17}H_{34}O_2$, an acid formerly erroneously supposed to be present in certain fats. It has a fatty aspect, and is insoluble in water, but readily soluble in hot alcohol; the latter, as it cools, deposits the acid in pearly scales, whence its name. It probably does not occur in nature.

margarin, margarine (mär'gạ-rin), n. [< margar(ic) + -in[2], -ine[2].] A peculiar pearl-like substance extracted from hogs' lard; the solid fatty matter of certain vegetable oils. The purest margarin is obtained from the concrete part of olive-oil. It is a mixture of stearin and palmatin.

margarita (mär-gạ-rī'tạ), n. [NL. (in def. 1 < LGr. μαργαρίτης, a crumb of the sacramental bread, lit. a pearl), < Gr. μαργαρίτης, a pearl: see margarite.] 1. In the Gr. Ch.: (a) The vessel in which the consecrated oblate is kept. (b) A portion of the oblate which is placed in the cup as a symbol of the union of the body and blood of Christ. See commixture.—2. [cap.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidæ. It is represented by a number of species in the colder seas.

Margaritacea (mär″gạ-ri-tā'sē-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of margaritaceus, pearly: see margaritaceous.] In old systems, a family of bivalves whose shells are pearly or nacreous inside; the pearl-oysters: same as Aviculidæ or Pteriidæ. In De Blainville's classification (1825), this family consisted of the genera Vulsella, Malleus, Pinna, Crenatula, Inoceramus, Catillus, Pulvinites, Gervillia, and Avicula, thus corresponding somewhat to the Malleacea of Lamarck. Also Margaritaceæ.

margaritacean (mär″gạ-ri-tā'sē-ạn), a. and n. [As margaritaceous + -an.] I. a. Margaritaceous; margaritiferous; specifically, of or pertaining to the Margaritacea.

II. n. A member of the Margaritacea.

margaritaceous (mär″gạ-ri-tā'shius), a. [< NL. margaritaceus, pearly, < L. margarita, a pearl: see margarite.] Resembling mother-of-pearl; pearly; glossy-white with purple, green, and blue reflections.

Margaritana (mar″gạ-ri-tā'nạ), n. [NL., < L. margarita, a pearl: see margarite.] A genus of river-mussels of the family Unionidæ. It is closely related to Unio, chiefly differing in some details of the hinge-teeth, and a species, M. margaritifera, is notable as a pearl-oyster, producing pearls of commercial value. Also called Alasmodon.

margarite (mär'gạ-rīt), n. [< ME. margarite, margrite (also margery, q. v.) (cf. AS. meregrot, meregreota = OS. merigriota = OHG. marigrioz, a pearl, forms simulating AS. mere, etc., sea, + greōt, etc., sand, gravel, grit), < OF. marguerite, marguerete, F. margarite, marguerite = Sp. Pg. margarita = It. margarita, margherita, a pearl, < L. margarita, rarely margaritum, = Bulg. margarit = Russ. margaritŭ, < Gr. μαργαρίτης, a pearl, also μάργαρον, a pearl, < μάργαρος, the pearl-oyster; cf. Pers. murwari (> Turk. mervarīd), a pearl.] 1. A pearl. [Obsolete or poetical.]

Rich orient pearl,
More bright of hue than were the margarites
That Cæsar found in wealthy Albion.
Greene, Orlando Furioso.

2. A mineral of micaceous structure, separable into thin laminæ which are rather brittle. It has a grayish or reddish color and a pearly luster on the cleavage-surface (hence called pearl-mica). In composition it is a silicate of aluminium and calcium. It is a common associate of corundum. It is one of the so-called brittle micas.

3. In petrog., a name proposed by Vogelsang for an arrangement of the elementary products of crystallization (globulites) in form like a string of beads. See longulite.—4. Same as margarita, 1.

margaritic (mär-gạ-rit'ik), a. [< margarite + -ic.] Pertaining to or resembling pearl or margarite; margaric.—Margaritic acid, one of the fatty acids which result from the saponification of castor-oil.

margaritiferous (mär″gạ-ri-tif'e-rus), a. [< L. margaritifer, pearl-bearing, < margarita, a pearl (see margarite), + ferre = E. bear[1].] Pearl-bearing; producing pearls; margaritaceous.

margaritite (mär'gạ-ri-tīt), n. [< NL. Margaritites, a generic name of such shells, < L. margarita, a pearl: see margarite.] A fossil pearl-oyster or some similar margaritiferous shell.

Margarodes (mär-gạ-rō'dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. μαργαρώδης, pearl-like, < μάργαρον, a pearl (see margarite), + εἶδος, form.] 1. A genus of scale-insects of the family Coccidæ. M. formicarum, so named from its pearly appearance and from its living with ants, is known in the Bahamas as the ground-pearl. Its scaly covering has caused it to be mistaken for a mollusk. These insects are sometimes strung like beads in necklaces. The genus is probably the same as Porphyrophora of Brandt (1833); it was named the same year by Guilding.

2. A genus of pyralid moths, typical of the family Margarodidæ, erected by Guenée in 1854, having the wings immaculate, neither fasciate nor marginate, and the body stout. They occur in most parts of the world, more abundantly in tropical countries. M. (Diaphania) quadristigmalis feeds in the larval state on the privet in the eastern United States.

Margarodidæ (mär-gạ-rod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Margarodes + -idæ.] A family of pyralid moths named from the genus Margarodes, having ample, entire, silky, semi-hyaline, iridescent or pearly wings, often bordered and seldom marked. The abdomen of the male has an apical tuft which is often bifid. It is a large wide-spread family of some 20 genera, as Diaphania, which contains the moths whose larvæ are known in the United States as melon-caterpillars and pickle-worms.

margarodite (mär'gạ-rō-dīt), n. [< Gr. μαργαρώδης, pearl-like (see Margarodes), + -ite[2].] A variety of muscovite, or common potash-mica, affording, upon ignition, a small percentage of water.

margaron, margarone (mär'gạ-ron, -rōn), n. [= F. margarone; as margar(ic) + -on, -one.] A solid white fatty ketone which crystallizes in pearly scales, and is obtained by distilling margaric acid with lime.

margaryize (mär'gar-i-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. margaryized, ppr. margaryizing. [< Margary (see def.) + -ize.] In the antiseptic treatment of timber, to impregnate (the wood) with a solution of sulphate of copper. The word is derived from the name of the inventor of the process, J. J. Lloyd Margary.

margate-fish (mär'gāt-fish), n. A fish, Hæmulon gibbosum or album, inhabiting the Caribbean Sea and Florida Keys. Its color is pearly-white, somewhat olivaceous above, with obsolete spots on some of the scales; the mouth is orange within, and the lips and a faint blotch on each side of the snout are light-yellow. It reaches a length of 2 feet or more, and is one of the most important food-fishes of Havana and Key West. Also called market-fish, maggot-fish, margaret-grunt.

Margaux (mär-gō'), n. [F.: see def.] Claret produced in the commune of Margaux, in the department of the Gironde in France. Its better grades closely resemble the Château Margaux. See château.

margay (mär'gā), n. [= F. margay; < Tupi maracayá, Guarani mbaracaia.] A South American tiger-cat, Felis tigrina, or F. margay; also, some related species. They are small spotted and striped cats resembling the ocelot, ranging from Mexico to Paraguay. The margay is about 2 feet long, the tail from 12 to 18 inches; it has been domesticated and made useful in destroying rats.

marge (märj), n. [< F. marge = Pr. marge = D. marge, < L. margo (margin-), border, margin: see margin.] Same as margin. [Poetical.]

By this the Muse arrives
At Elie's isled marge.
Drayton, Polyolbion, xxii. 1632.

The drum, suspended by its tattered marge,
Once rolled and rattled to the Hessian's charge.
O. W. Holmes, Metrical Essay.

marged (märjd), a. [< marge + -ed[2].] Bordered; having a margin.

From that gold-sanded, flower-marged shore.
The Week, VI. 186.

margent (mär'jent), n. and a. [A var. of margin, with unorig. -t as in parchment, tyrant, etc.] I. n. 1. A margin. [Obsolete or archaic.]

The beached margent of the sea.
Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 85.

Be not deceav'd, Readers, by men that would overawe your eares with big names and huge Tomes that contradict and repeal one another, because they can cramme a margent with citations. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

By the margent of the sea
I would build myself a home.
R. H. Stoddard, By the Margent of the Sea.

2. Gloss; marginal comment.

See at the bar the booby Bettesworth, . . .
Who knows of law nor text nor margent. Swift.

II. a. Marginal.

Margent notes upon a French text.
R. Saltonstall, To Winthrop (1643).

Here, peradventure, my witless youth may be taxed with a margent note of presumption, for offering to put up any motion of applause in the behalf of so excellent a poet.
Nash (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 498).

margent†, (mär'jent), v. t. [< margent, n.] To note or enter on the margin; margin.

I present it [England's Eliza] in one whole entire hymne, distinguishing it only by succession of yeares, which I have margented through the whole story.
Mir. for Mags., p. 775, Pref.

margery†, n. [< ME. margery, margerye, < OF. margerie, marguerie, vernacular form of marguerite, var. of margarite, a pearl.] A pearl.

margery-pearl†, n. [ME. margery perl.] Same as margery. Prompt. Parv., p. 214.

And seyde, "noli mittere man margerye-perlis Amanges hogges, that han hawes at wille."
Piers Plowman (B), x. 9.

★margin (mär'jin), n. [Also marge (< F.), formerly also margine (and margent, q. v.); < ME. margin, margyne, < OF. margine (usually marge, F. marge) = Sp. margen = Pg. margem = It. margine, a border, margin, = Serv. marginj, a hill (as a boundary, an ant-hill, mole-hill), < L. margo (margin-), edge, brink, border, margin: see mark[1].] 1. A bordering or bounding space; a border; a space between one edge or line and another, as that along a river between the edge of the water or of its bed and a real or imaginary outer line, or the like, or that between the edges of a leaf or sheet of paper and those of the printing or writing on it. In some plants the leaf (then called marginate) has a distinct margin or border of different formation or coloration from the main body. In the case of a book, margin alone usually means the clear space between the print and the outer edge of the leaf, called distinctively the front margin; the head or top margin is at the top of the page, the tail or bottom margin at the foot, and the back margin on the inner side against the back. Parts of these margins, especially at the sides, may be occupied by marginal notes, remarks, or the like. An opened margin is one where the leaves have been opened or separated, as with a folder, but not trimmed; an uncut margin has not been cut anywhere; a rough-cut margin has only the more protruding ragged edges cut off with scissors; in a cropped margin too much paper has been cut away; in a bled margin part of the print has been cut away.

We came into the road, where I saw an antient way about eighteen feet broad, paved with large round stones, having a margin on each side, partly of hewn stone.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 80.

Thus on Mæander's flowery margin lies
The dying swan. Pope, R. of the L., v. 65.

With plates of brass the cors'let cover'd o'er
(The same renown'd Asteropæus wore),
Whose glitt'ring margins raised with silver shine
(No vulgar gift), Eumelus! shall be thine.
Pope, Iliad, xxiii. 641.

Starts, when he sees the hazels quiver
Along the margin of the river.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, ii.

Specifically—(a) In an engraving, the paper left blank outside the plate-mark. (b) In entom., properly, the outer part of a surface or distinct portion of the integument, as distinguished from the central part or disk. In this sense margin is not to be confounded with edge, which is used to denote the extreme boundary of a part: but where distinction is unnecessary, the two terms are often used synonymously. (c) In conch., the edge or entire outline of a bivalve shell. (d) In bot.: (1) The edge. (2) A distinct border, different from the body of the organ, as the membranous expansion surrounding some seeds or seed-vessels; a narrow wing.

2. In joinery, the flat part of the stiles and rails of framed work. Doors which are made in two widths or leaves are called double-margined, in consequence of the stiles being repeated in the center; and so are also those doors which are made to imitate two-leafed doors.

3. Latitude, scope, or range; freedom from narrow restriction or limitation; room or provision for enlarged or extended action.

Their margin of effective operation is strictly limited; still, such a margin exists, and they [trades-unions] have turned it to account. Rae, Contemporary Socialism, viii.

4. Allowance made, security given, or scope afforded for contingencies, as profit or loss in trade, error of calculation, change of circumstances, diversity of judgment or opinion, etc.

There is always margin enough in the statute for a liberal judge to read one way and a servile judge another. Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

5. In speculative dealings on the exchanges: (a) The sum in money, or represented by securities, deposited by a speculator or trader with his broker as a provision against loss on transactions made on account. This margin is usually reckoned at 10 per cent. of the par value of stocks or bonds, and 10 cents per bushel or barrel on grain or oil. If the price rises or falls to a satisfactory extent, a sale or purchase is made, and the gain is the customer's profit, less the broker's charges; if the price falls below or rises above the margin furnished, and the purchase is to be protected in expectation of a future rise or fall, the customer is required to furnish ("put up") more margin to cover the difference.

The banks refused to loan upon any except first-class collateral, and commission-houses regarded the market as in a somewhat dangerous condition for speculators on margin. Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 342.

(b) A deposit made by each of two brokers, parties to a contract, when one is "called up" (as it is termed) by the other. This mutual deposit (usually of 5 per cent.) is made in some bank or trust company agreed upon, and remains subject only to a joint check or draft during the continuance of the contract upon which it has been called.—Cardinal, costal, dentate, dilated margin. See the adjectives.—Dislocated margin. See dislocate.—Double margin, a margin in which there is a fine groove along the outer side, the margin being thus composed of two parallel edges or carinæ with the groove between them.—Eroded margin. See erode.—Filate, incrassate, inferior, inner, etc., margin. See the adjectives.—Margin draft. See margin-draft.—Margin of a course, in arch., that part of the upper side of a course of slates which is left uncovered by the next superior course.—To make margin, in printing, to determine the proper amount of margin to be given to printed pages by the selection of blanks or of low furniture of suitable sizes.—Syn. 1. Confine, limit, skirt. See rim.

margin (mär'jin), v. t. [< F. marginer = Sp. Pg. marginar = It. marginare, < L. marginare, furnish with a border, < margo (margin-), a border: see margin, n.] 1. To furnish with a margin; form or constitute a margin to; border.

The ice-born rivers . . . were margined occasionally with spires of discolored ice. Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., II. 150.

2. To enter in the margin, as a note in a book.—To margin up, to put up margins, as a provision against loss by a broker who has purchased and holds stocks, etc., on behalf of a customer; cover loss on account of depreciation of prices.

The concern then had $42,500,000 locked up on the Bourse, having trebled its liabilities in the vain attempt to margin up after a fall begun in September, 1881. Amer. Economist, III. 176.

★marginal (mär'ji-nal), a. [= F. marginal = Sp. Pg. marginal = It. marginale, < NL. marginalis, < L. margo (margin-), margin: see margin.] Pertaining to a margin; situated on or near the margin; specifically, written or printed in the margin of a page: as, a marginal note or gloss.

To come into the dim reflexion of hollow antiquities sold by the seeming bulk, and there be fain to club quotations with Men whose learning and belief lies in marginal stuffings. Milton, Church-Government, ii., Pref.

The passage itself is set down in the marginal notes. Pope, Temple of Fame, Adv't.

Inner marginal cell. See inner.—Marginal bodies, marginal vesicles, in hydroid polyps, differentiated sensory organs attached to the edge of the umbrella. Those which are pigmented are supposed to have a visual function, those which have hard concretions to be auditory. (See cut under lithocyst.) Different kinds of marginal bodies have special names.—Marginal bones or ossicles, supernumerary digital phalanges lying along the inner or the outer border of the flipper of an ichthyosaur. (See cut under Ichthyosauria.) The marginal bones furnish a remarkable instance of more than the normal five digits of vertebrates.—Marginal cell, in entom., a cell or space of the wing anterior to the marginal vein and attaining the apical margin.—Marginal finger†, the index-finger.

Would I had seen thee graved with thy great sire,
Ere lived to have men's marginal fingers point
At Charalois, as a lamented story!
Massinger and Field, Fatal Dowry, iii. 1.

Marginal fringes, in ornith. See fringe.—Marginal gemmation. See gemmation.—Marginal gyrus. See gyrus.—Marginal line, in entom., a variously waved or angulated line running across the anterior wing near the apical margin, distinguished in many moths.—Marginal lobe, lobule. See lobe.—Marginal notes, notes printed on the front margin or fore edge of the leaf. Often called side notes.—Marginal vein or nervure, in entom., a vein of an insect's wing, extending more or less longitudinally toward the apical margin. It may arise from the pterostigma and form a curved line, as in some Hymenoptera (in which case it is also called the radial vein), or it may be a posterior fork of the costal vein, as in certain Diptera.—Marginal vesicles. See marginal bodies.

marginalia (mär-ji-nā'li-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of marginalis, marginal: see marginal.] 1. Marginal notes.—2. In sponges, spicules forming a collar round the osculum. F. E. Schulze.

marginalize (mär'ji-nal-īz), v.; pret. and pp. marginalized, ppr. marginalizing. [< marginal + -ize.] I. trans. To furnish with marginal notes. [Rare.]

Augustine's Confessions, in the same library, he [Archbishop Leighton] similarly marginalized. F. Jacox, Literary Life, p. 104.

II. intrans. To make marginal notes. [Rare.]

Byron could marginalize with similar fertility and facility. F. Jacox, Literary Life, p. 112.

marginally (mär'ji-nal-i), adv. In the margin, as of a book.

marginant (mär'ji-nant), a. In bot., becoming marginate.

marginate (mär'ji-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. marginated, ppr. marginating. [< L. marginatus, pp. of marginare, furnish with a border: see margin, v.] To furnish with a margin or margins.

marginate (mär'ji-nāt), a. [< L. marginatus, pp.: see the verb.] Having a margin. Specifically, in entom.: (a) Having the margin of a distinct color: as, marginate with purple. (b) Having a distinct margin or edge, as the pronotum of many beetles.—Marginate abdomen, in entom., an abdomen that is compressed and has the sides of the dorsal segments elevated, as in many Staphylinidæ; or projecting beyond the wing-covers in a sharp ridge, as in many Hemiptera and Orthoptera, and a few Coleoptera.

marginated (mär'ji-nā-ted), a. Same as marginate.

margin-draft (mär'jin-drȧft), n. In masonry, a plane chiseled surface adjoining the edge or edges of a hewn block, as that about the joints of a usual variety of ashler, in which the margin-draft incloses the middle part of the face, which may either be dressed or left rough.

margined (mär'jind), a. [< margin + *-ed*2.] Marginate; specifically, in bot., having a distinct and projecting edge or wing, as the borders of many flat seeds.—Margined fruit-bat, Cynopterus marginatus, a small East Indian species, about 4 inches long, whose ears are marginate or edged with white.

Marginella (mär-ji-nel'ä), n. [NL., dim. of L. margo (margin-), edge, border: see margin.] The typical genus of the family Marginellidæ. There are some 200 species, found in all warm seas, of small size, with smooth oval shells having a small respiratory notch. The best representatives of the genus have an evident spire, as M. nubeculata; some others, with sunken spire, as M. lineata, form a subgenus Persicula.

Marginella nubeculata.

Marginellacea (mär″ji-ne-lā'sē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Marginella + -acea.] Same as Marginellidæ.

Marginellidæ (mär-ji-nel'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Marginella + -idæ.] A family of gastropods, typified by the genus Marginella. The animal has only rachidian teeth, tentacles approximate at base, eyes above their base, and a large foot. The shell is involute or obovate, with a short or sunken spire, polished porcellaneous surface, and has several distinct plaits on the columellar lip.

marginelliform (mär-ji-nel'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Marginella + L. forma, form.] Having the character of a Marginella or related mollusks.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 330.

Flanked with a ditch, and forced out of a marish.
B. Jonson, Underwoods, lxii.

And far through the marish green and still
The tangled water-courses slept.
Tennyson, Dying Swan.

II. a. Marshy. [Now only poetical.]

This Countrey of Moscouie hath also very many and great riuers in it, and is marish ground in many places.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 247.

The frank sun of natures clear and rare
Breeds poisonous fogs in low and marish minds.
Lowell, Dara.

marish-beetle (mar′ish-bē″tl), n. Same as marsh-beetle.

Marist (mā′rist), n. and a. [NL. Marista, < LL. Maria, Mary (see def.): see marry[2].] I. n. A member of a Roman Catholic congregation devoted to the management of schools, instruction in industry and agriculture, etc. It was founded at Bordeaux in 1818, and has many establishments in France and other countries. Unlike the Brethren of the Christian Schools, the Marists receive pay from their pupils.

II. a. Pertaining or relating to the Virgin Mary; devoted to the service of the Virgin: as, Marist monks.

maritagium (mar-i-taj′i-um), n. [ML.: see marriage.] In feudal hist., the right of the king, upon the death of a tenant in capite, to dispose of the heiress (and, by a later extension of the right, of the heir, if male) in marriage. This right, which originated in the interest of the feudal superior to secure a fit tenant, grew to be a pecuniary resource, and was enforced by imposing on heirs and heiresses refusing to be thus disposed of, or marrying without royal consent, a forfeiture of double the value of the right of disposal thus denied.

marital (mar′i-tal), a. [= F. marital = Sp. Pg. marital = It. maritale, < L. maritalis, of or belonging to married people, < maritus, of or belonging to marriage, as a noun, maritus, m., a husband, marita, f., a wife: see marry[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to a husband, or to marriage as it concerns the husband: as, marital rights or authority; marital devotion.

A husband may exercise his marital authority so far as to give his wife moderate correction.
Art of Tormenting. (Richardson.)

Hence—2. Pertaining to or of the nature of marriage; matrimonial; connubial.

It is said that marital alliance between these races is unnatural. N. A. Rev., CXLII. 439.

Marital affection (affectio maritalis), in Rom. law, the circumstance which distinguished marriage from concubinage, namely the intention to found a legal family, so that the children born of the connection should legally have a father; this is expressed by liberorum querendorum causa. Puchta. = Syn. Nuptial, Connubial, etc. (See matrimonial.)

maritated† (mar′i-tā-ted), a. [< L. maritatus, pp. of maritare (> It. maritare), marry: see marry[1].] Having a husband. Bailey, 1727.

maritim†, a. See maritime.

maritimal† (mā-rit′i-mal), a. [< maritime + -al.] Same as maritime.

Skill of warlike seruice, and experience in maritimal causes. Holinshed, Descrip. of Ireland, Ep. Ded.

maritimate† (mā-rit′i-māt), a. [< maritime + -ate[1].] Adjoining the sea; maritime.

Leaving his own name to some maritimate province on that side. Raleigh, Hist. World, i. 8.

★ maritime (mar′i-tim or -tīm), a. [Formerly also maritim; < F. maritime = Sp. marítimo = Pg. It. marittimo, < L. maritimus, also maritumus, of or belonging to the sea, < mare, the sea: see marine.] 1. Of, pertaining to, or connected with the sea or its uses; having physical relation to the sea: as, maritime dangers or pursuits; a maritime town or power.

The borders maritime Lack blood to think on 't.
Shak., A. and C., i. 4. 51.

But the Mahometans made the midst of the land the seat of their Empire, both the better to keep the whole in subjection, and for fear of the Christians invading the maritim places. Sandys, Travailes (1652), p. 85.

2. Relating to or concerned with marine navigation, employment, or interests: as, maritime law; a maritime project.

His youth and want of experience in maritime service.
Sir H. Wotton, Duke of Buckingham. (Latham.)

Even in the maritime reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Edward Coke thinks it matter of boast that the royal navy of England then consisted of three-and-thirty ships.
Blackstone, Com., I. xiii.

3. In zoöl., technically, inhabiting the sea-shore; living coastwise; littoral: distinguished from marine.

Undrained and marshy land is, however, best suited to this bird [the pewit or lapwing], whose habits are partly maritime. W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 525.

Maritime Assizes of Jerusalem. See assize.—Maritime contract, a contract that relates to navigation or commerce by water, as one for hiring seamen, a charter-party, a marine-insurance policy, or the like, as distinguished from those made and to be performed on land, even although having relation to shipping, as a contract to build a ship, which is not maritime. The importance of the distinction lies in the fact that courts of admiralty have jurisdiction of causes arising under maritime contracts.—Maritime courts. See court.—Maritime fruit-bat, Cynonycteris amplexicaudata, found along coasts from the Persian gulf to the Philippines.—Maritime interest, a premium or rate of interest allowed on a bottomry bond, and not limited by the usury laws.—Maritime law, the system of principles and rules which regulate property, business, and conduct in matters of navigation and of commerce by water.—Maritime liens. See lien[2], 1 (b).—Maritime state, an expression sometimes used to designate the body which consists of the officers and mariners of the British navy, who are governed by express and permanent laws, or the articles of the navy, established by act of Parliament. Imp. Dict.—Maritime tort, a wrong the commission of which occurs on the high seas, so that it is within the jurisdiction of a court of admiralty. = Syn. Marine, Maritime, Naval, Nautical. Marine refers to the sea in its merely physical aspects: as, a marine product; marine fauna; marine deposits. Maritime refers to the sea more especially as a field for human action, or as connected with human interests, and to position on or near the sea: as, Great Britain is a maritime nation, and a great naval power; we speak of maritime laws, interests, perils, life. By derivation naval refers to ships, and nautical to sailors. Naval is applicable more especially to what pertains to a ship of war or a navy, its crew, equipments, tactics, etc., but in some uses to shipping in general; nautical to what pertains to the science or art of navigation: as, naval officers, heroes, battles, administration; the naval profession; naval stores; nautical calculations made at the Naval Observatory; a nautical almanac; nautical instruments. A nautical mile is viewed as a mile to be sailed.

maritonuclear (mar″i-tō-nū′klē-ăr), a. [< maritonucleus + -ar[3].] Pertaining to a maritonucleus.

maritonucleus (mar″i-tō-nū′klē-us), n.; pl. maritonuclei (-ī). [NL., < L. maritus, married, + nucleus, nucleus.] In embryol., a "married" bisexed or duplex nucleus; the renovated nucleus of an ovum after its union with the male pronucleus or spermonucleus; the cleavage nucleus. See feminonucleus. Hyatt.

mariturient† (mar-i-tū′ri-ent), a. [< L. maritus, a husband (maritare, marry), + -urient, a desiderative suffix, as in esurient, etc.] Wishing to become a husband. Gray, Letter to T. Wharton, April 29, 1765.

marjay (mär′jā), n. Same as margay.

marjerom†, n. See marjoram.

marjoram (mär′jō-ram), n. [Early mod. E. also marjerome, margerim, margerome, merjerum, marjoran, majerom, majoram, majoran, < ME. marjoran*, marjoron, majoran, < OF. marjoraine*, marjolaine, margelyne, F. marjolaine = Sp. mayorana = Pg. maiorana, mangerona = It. majorana, maggiorana = D. maioleyne, mariolein = MHG. meigramme, also meioron, meiron, G. majoran, dial. maigram, meiran, < ML. majorana, a corrupt form due to Rom. influence, simulating L. major, greater (the Teut. forms suffering further perversion), < L. amaracus, amaracum, < Gr. ἀμάρακος, ἀμάρακον, marjoram (the Greek plant so named being appar. bulbous, the Persian or Egyptian species prob. marjoram).] A plant of either of the genera Majorana and Origanum, belonging to the Menthaceæ or mint family. The sweet marjoram, Majorana Majorana (Origanum Majorana of Linnæus), is peculiarly aromatic and fragrant, and much used in cookery. The common or wild marjoram, Origanum vulgare, is a native of Europe, and is a perennial plant with opposite leaves and small pink flowers, growing in calcareous soils.

Here's flowers for you;
Hot lavender, mints, savory, marjoram.
Shak., W. T., iv 4. 104.

★ mark[1] (märk), n. [(a) < ME. mark, merk, merke, < AS. mearc, neut., = D. merk, mark = OHG. marc*, MHG. marc, neut., G. marke, f., = Icel. mark, neut., = Sw. märke = Dan. mærke, a mark, sign; hence (< Teut.) F. marque (which in some senses is merged in E. mark[1]) = Sp. Pg. It. marco, a mark, sign; these forms being prob. connected with (b) march[1], ME. marche, marke, < AS. mearc, f., boundary, = OS. marca = OFries. merke, merike, merik = D. marke = MLG. marke, merke, a district, = OHG. marca, marcha, MHG. marke, G. mark, f., a boundary, district, = Icel. merki, m., a boundary, mörk, a border district, = Sw. Dan. mark, a field, = Goth. marka, f., a boundary, confine, coast; hence (< Teut.) F. marche = Sp. Pg. It. ML. marca, border, march (see march[1]); = L. margo, edge, marge, margin (> E. margin, marge), = Zend merezu, boundary. The sense 'boundary' is older as recorded, though the sense 'sign' seems logically precedent. The two groups may indeed be from entirely different roots.] 1. A visible impression made by some material object upon another; a line, dot, dent, cut, stamp, bruise, scar, spot, stain, etc., consisting either of the visible effect produced by the impressing object or the transfer of a part of its substance. A mark in this general sense is understood to be an incidental or a casual effect, without significance except with reference to means or results.

Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you. Lev. xix. 28.

I have some marks of yours upon my pate.
Shak., C. of E., i. 2. 82.

Specifically—2. An impressed or attached sign, stamp, label, or ticket; a significant or distinguishing symbol or device; that which is impressed or stamped upon or fixed to something for information, identification, or verification: as, a manufacturer's marks on his wares (see trade-mark); the mark made by an illiterate person opposite or between the parts of his name when written by another on his behalf; a merchant's private marks on his goods, to indicate their price or other particulars to his assistants; a mark branded on an animal by its owner; to give a student so many marks for proficiency. See hall-mark. In ceramics the mark is a cipher, word, or other device put upon a piece of ware, usually on the bottom or the under side, as an indication of the pottery from which it comes, a signature of the painter who decorated it, or the like. Such marks are often impressed in the clay before the glaze is applied, and often painted under the glaze, or otherwise permanently affixed. Very rarely they form a part of the decoration, as the Chinese characters painted in gold or in red on the Japanese ware known as Kaga or Kutani. On a nautical lead line a mark is one of the measured indications of depth, consisting of a white, blue, or red rag, a bit of leather, or a knot of small line.

The Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him. Gen. iv. 15.

Dost thou use to write thy name? or hast thou a mark to thyself? Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 2. 110.

The method of the Saxons was . . . to affix [to their names] the sign of the cross; which custom our illiterate vulgar do to this day keep up, by signing a cross for their mark when unable to write their names.

Blackstone, Com., II. xx.

She had grown up with a twin brother, studying from the same books and in the same classes, and getting the same marks, or higher ones.
Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 918.

3. A distinguishing physical peculiarity; a spot, mote, nævus, special formation, or other singularity; a natural sign: as, a birth-mark; the marks on sea-shells or wild animals. In farriery the mark is a deep median depression on the cutting surface of the incisor tooth of a horse, due to the infliction of a vertical fold of the tooth. It is seen of different characters according to the wear of the tooth, being thus to some extent an index of a horse's age. It disappears after the tooth is worn down beyond the extent of the fold. The dark color is due simply to the accumulation in the fold of food or dirt. See the quotation under mark-tooth.

He that by good use and experience hath in his eye the right mark and very true lustre of the diamond rejecteth and will not look upon the counterfeit, be it ever so well handled, ever so craftily polished!
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), Int., p. xc.

For marks descried in men's nativity
Are nature's faults, not their own infamy.
Shak., Lucrece, l. 538.

4. A significant note, character, sign, token, or indication; a determinative attestation. In logic, to say that a thing has a certain mark is to say that something in particular is true of it. Thus, according to a certain school of metaphysicians, "incognizability is a mark of the Infinite."

I do spy some marks of love in her.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 3. 255.

Pride and covetousnesse are the sure markes of those false Prophets which are to come.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

I saw his Ma'tie (com'ing from his Northern Expedition) ride in pomp, and a kind of ovation, with all the markes of an happy peace. Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 30, 1640.

A mark is that in a thing which constitutes a part of the cognition of it; or, what comes to the same thing, a partial representation, so far as it is considered as a ground of cognition of the whole representation. All our concepts are therefore marks, and all thinking is nothing but representing by marks. Kant, Logic (trans.), Int., viii.

5. A guiding or indicative sign or token. (a) That which serves as an indication of place or direction; an object that marks or points out: as, a book-mark; boundary-marks; to guide a vessel by land-marks on the shore.

The steamer swung into her (to me) utterly invisible marks. S. L. Clemens, Life on the Mississippi, p. 97.

(b) A badge, banner, or other distinguishing device.

The banners (or marks) of the ancient Danes were in times of peace light-colored, but in war times of a blood color, with a black raven on a red ground.
Preble, Hist. of the Flag, p. 23.

6. An object aimed at; a point of assault or attack; especially, something set up or marked out to be shot at: often used figuratively: as, to hit or miss the mark; a mark for detraction.

By fifty pase, our kynge sayd,
The merkes were to longe.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 113).

I will shoot three arrows at the side thereof, as though I shot at a mark. 1 Sam. xx. 20.

For slander's mark was ever yet the fair.
Shak., Sonnets, lxx.

Death loves a shining mark, a signal blow.
Young, Night Thoughts, v. 1011.

7. An object of endeavor; a point or purpose striven for; that which one aims to reach or attain.

I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Phil. iii. 14.

Make therefore to yourself some mark, and go towards it allegrement. Donne, Letters, xx.

Define it well;
For fear divine Philosophy
Should push beyond her mark.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, liii.

8. An attainable point or limit; capacity for reaching; reach; range. [Rare.]

You are abused
Beyond the mark of thought.
Shak., A. and C., iii. 6. 87.

9. An object of note or observation; hence, a pattern or example. [Rare.]

He was the mark and glass, copy and book,
That fashion'd others. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 3. 31.

10. Right to notice or observation; claim or title to distinction; importance; eminence: as, a man of mark.

And left me in reputeless banishment,
A fellow of no mark nor likelihood.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 2. 45.

Soldiers of royal mark scorn such base purchase.
Fletcher (and another), False One, iv. 2.

For performance of great mark it needs extraordinary health. Emerson, Conduct of Life.

11. A marking or noting; note; attention; observance. [Rare.]

Bot first, of shippe-craft can I right noght,
Of ther makyng haue I no merke. York Plays, p. 42.

He hath devoted . . . himself to the contemplation, mark, and denotement of her parts and graces.
Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 322.

12. A license of reprisals. See marque.—13. A boundary; a bound or limit noted or established; hence, a set standard, or a limit to be reached: as, to speak within the mark; to be up to the mark.

In that Contree of Libye is the See more highe than the Lond; and it semethe that it wolde covere the Erthe, and natheles zit it passethe not his Markes.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 144.

Choose discreetly,
And Virtue guide you! There all the world, in one man, Stands at the mark. Fletcher, Mad Lover, v. 4.

It's only a question between the larger sum and the smaller. I shall be within the mark any way.
Dickens, Bleak House, xxxvii.

The ancient capital of Burgundy is wanting in character; it is not up to the mark.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 253.

14. In the middle ages, in England and Germany, a tract of land belonging in common to a community of freemen, who divided the cultivated portion or arable mark among their individual members, used the common or ordinary mark together for pasturage or other general purposes, and dwelt in the village mark or central portion, or apart on their holdings. It was a customary tenure, like that of the existing Russian mir, and was similarly managed and governed.

The Mark System, as it was called, according to which the body of kindred freemen, scattered over a considerable area and cultivating their lands in common, use a domestic constitution based entirely or primarily on the community of tenure and cultivation. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 19.

15†. Image; likeness.

Which mankynde is so fair part of thy werk
That thou it madest lyk to thyn owene merk.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 152.

Hence—16†. The mass of beings having a common likeness; posterity.

If wommen hadde writen stories,
As clerkes han withinne hire oratories,
They wolde han writen of men moore wikkednesse
Than al the mark of Adam may redresse.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 696.

Accidental synthetical mark, a mark not predicated of the subject in the definition of it.—Adequate mark. Same as adequate definition (which see, under definition).—Analytical mark. Same as essential mark.—Arable mark. See def. 14.—Beside the mark. See beside.—Bird mark, a well-known mark of certain pieces of pottery, indicating Liverpool wares, and supposed to be the crest belonging to the arms of the city of Liverpool.—Cadence-mark, in music, a vertical stroke in a text arranged for chanting, to indicate how the words are to be fitted to the measures of the cadences.—Common mark. See def. 14.—Constitutive mark, in logic. See constitutive.—Coördinate marks, in logic, independent predicates of the same subject.—Demerit mark. See demerit[2].—Diacritical mark. See diacritical.—Essential mark, in logic, one of the characters predicated in the definition of anything. Also called analytical mark.—Fruitful mark, in logic. See fruitful.—God bless or God save the mark! Save the mark! etc., ejaculatory or parenthetical phrases expressive of irony, scorn, deprecation, surprise, or a humorous sense of the extraordinary. "In archery, when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out 'God save the mark!'—that is, prevent any one coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. Ironically it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere." Brewer, Dict. Phrase and Fable, p. 790.

For he made me mad
To see him shine so brisk and smell so sweet,
And talk so like a waiting-gentlewoman
Of guns and drums and wounds—God save the mark!
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 56.

To be ruled by my conscience, I should stay with the Jew my master, who, God bless the mark, is a kind of devil.
Shak., M. of V., ii. 2. 25.

My father had no more nose, my dear, saving the mark! than there is upon the back of my hand. Sterne.

"Deny myself" meant simply pleasure you,
The sacred and superior, save the mark!
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 278.

God's mark†. See God[1].—Hall mark. See hall-mark.—Harmonic mark. See harmonic.—High-water mark. See water.—Leading marks. See leading[1].—Lenticular mark. See lenticular.—Low-water mark. See water.—Mark moot, formerly, in England, a village assembly which had such direction of the affairs of the mark or village community as devolved in later times on the manorial court and the vestry. I wonder he should mark me out so!
B. Jonson, Sejanus, i. 2.

To mark time. (a) Milit., to move the feet alternately in the same manner, and at the same rate, as in marching, but without changing ground. (b) To indicate the rhythm for music; beat time.—To mark up, the opposite of to mark down (b).—Syn. 1. To brand.—3. To show, evince, indicate, betoken, denote.—4. To note, remark.

II. intrans. 1. To act as marker or scorekeeper; keep a score; set down or record results at successive stages.

You marking, as well as I, we may put both our marks together, when they are gone, and confer of them.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, ii. 1.

2. To note; take notice.

O upright judge! Mark, Jew: O learned judge! Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 313.

★mark[2] (märk), n. [Also marc; < ME. mark, marc, < AS. marc, a weight (of silver or gold), = OFries. merk = D. mark = OLG. mark, merk = OHG. marka* (> ML. marca, It. marca, OF. marc, etc.), MHG. mark, marke, G. mark, f., a weight of silver or gold, a coin, = Icel. mörk, a weight (½ lb.) of silver or gold, = Sw. Dan. mark; usually identified, in the orig. supposed sense a 'stamped coin,' with mark[1], a sign, stamp; but the sense of 'a particular weight' seems to be older.] 1. A unit of weight used in England before the Conquest, and in nearly all the countries of Europe down to the introduction of the metric system, especially for gold and silver. It was generally equal to 8 ounces. In 1524 the Cologne mark was made the standard for gold and silver throughout the German-Roman empire, and copies were distributed to all the principal cities. But, owing to the carelessness with which these were made, preserved, and copied, the Cologne mark came to have different values in different places. The following table shows the values of some of the principal marks in English troy grains, either directly as given, or reduced from French grains, doli, or milligrams. The larger discrepancies are in most cases due to known changes of standards.

2. An Anglo-Saxon and early English money of account In the tenth century it was estimated at 100 silver pennies, but from the end of the twelfth century (or earlier) onward at 160 pennies or 13*s.* 4*d.* (in money of the time). The mark was never an Anglo-Saxon or English coin, as is often erroneously stated.

There's a franklin in the wild of Kent hath brought three hundred marks with him in gold. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 61.

A special gentle,
That is the heir to forty marks a year.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, i. 1.

Obverse. Reverse.
German Mark. (Size of the original.)

5, 10, and 20 marks are current. The thaler is 3 marks.

4. The monetary unit of Finland, equivalent to 19.3 United States cents. Gold pieces of 10 and 20 marks are coined, and silver of 2, 1, ½, and ¼ marks.

5. A silver coin of Scotland issued in 1663 by Charles II., worth at the time 13*s.* 4*d.* Scotch (or 13 pence and one third of a penny English). The thistle-merk (so called from its reverse type being a thistle) was a Scotch silver coin of the same value issued by James VI. In this sense commonly spelled merk.—Mark banco, a money of account formerly used in Hamburg, of the value of about 35 United States cents: so called to distinguish it from the mark courant, a coin of the value of about 28 United States cents. The mark banco has not been used since the Franco-German war of 1870–1. (See also half-mark.) mark[3]† (märk), v. i. [ME. marken, merken; var. of march[3].] To march; proceed.

Cf. marchet, merchet, mercheta.] 1. An occasion on which goods are publicly exposed for sale and buyers assemble to purchase; the meeting together of people for selling and buying at private sale, as distinguished from an auction, where the sale is public.

"Market is over for us to-day," said Molly Corney, in disappointed surprise. "We must make the best on 't, and sell to th' huxters." Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, ii.

And he answered, "What's the use
Of this bragging up and down,
When three women and one goose
Make a market in your town?"
Longfellow, Wayside Inn, Saga of King Olaf, ix.

2. A public place or building where goods are exposed for sale; a market-place or market-house.

A footsore ox in crowded ways
Stumbling across the market to his death.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3. The assemblage of people in a market: as, there was a large market to-day.

What are known as the markets in the stock exchange are simply groups of jobbers distributed here and there on the floor of the house. Habit or convenience seems to have determined the particular spots occupied, which are known as the consol market, the English railway market, the foreign stock market, and so on.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 557.

4. A place of purchase and sale in general; a city, country, region, or locality where anything is or may be bought or sold: as, the home or foreign market (the country in which goods are produced, or that to which they are transported or from which they are brought); the American or British market; the London market.

There is a third thing to be considered—how a market can be obtained for produce, or how production can be limited to the capacities of the market. J. S. Mill.

5. Traffic; trade; purchase or sale, or rate of purchase and sale; demand; hence, price; cost; worth; valuation: as, to make market; a ready market; a dull market; the market is low; there is no market for such goods.

Second Pro. I prithee look what market she hath made.
First Pro. Imprimis, sir, a good fat loin of mutton.
Middleton, Chaste Maid, ii. 2.

Strange! how the frequent interjected dash Quickens a market, and helps off the trash.
Cowper, Charity, l. 522.

The market to-day has been more active than for a considerable time. Manchester Guardian, Dec. 16, 1880.

6. In Eng. law: (a) The franchise or liberty granted to or enjoyed by a municipality or other body to establish a place, usually in an open space, for the meeting of people to buy and sell under prescribed conditions. (b) The assemblage of buyers and sellers on the day and within the hours appointed. The importance of the distinction between a market and any other mart arose from (1) the necessity of public authority for making such use of a street or place, (2) the value of an exclusive franchise of this kind, and (3) the rule of English law that a buyer in open market gets good title, though the seller may not have had good title.—Clerk of the market. See clerk.—Court of the clerk of the market. See court.—Market overt, in Eng. law, open market; a place where the public are invited to send and sell, and to come and buy. The peculiar feature of trade in market overt is that the buyer may get good title though the seller has not.—Market price, the price a commodity will bring when sold in open market; price current.

The market price of every particular commodity is regulated by the proportion which is actually brought to market and the demand of those who are willing to pay the natural price of the commodity, or the whole value of the rent, labour, and profit which must be paid in order to bring it thither. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations.

Market value, value established or shown by sales, public or private, in the ordinary course of business. See market price.—To bull, corner, forestall, glut, hold the market. See the verbs.

★marl[1] (märl), n. [< ME. marl, marle, merle, < OF. marle, merle, F. marne = D. MLG. mergel = OHG. mergil, MHG. G. mergel = Sw. Dan. mergel, < ML. margila, marl, dim. of L. marga (> It. Sp. Pg. marga), marl. Perhaps a Celtic word: cf. Bret. marg, marl; but the W. marl, Ir. Gael. marla, marl, must be of E. origin.] A mixture of clay with carbonate of lime, the latter being present in considerable quantity, forming a mass which is not consolidated, but falls to pieces readily on exposure to the air. The word marl, however, is used so vaguely as to be often ambiguous; and in England some substances are thus designated in which there is no lime. Marl is a valuable fertilizing material for different kinds of soil, according to its composition. In New Jersey the mixtures of greensand with clay much used as fertilizers are commonly called marls, or greensand-marls, and many varieties thus designated contain no more than one or two per cent. of carbonate of lime. Marls and marly soils are especially well developed in the Permian and Triassic of England and on the continent. The upper division of the Keuper in England is known as the "Red Marl Series," and in places reaches a thickness of 3,000 feet. These marls are largely quarried at various points for making bricks. See shell-marl.

For lacke of dounge in sondy lande be spronge

Over the burning marle. Milton, P. L., i. 296.

marl[1] (märl), v. t. [< marl[1], n.] To overspread or manure with marl.

Never yet was the man known that herewith marled the same ground twice in his lifetime.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xvii. 8.

Who would hold any land,
To have the trouble to marl it?
B. Jonson, Staple of News, ii. 1.

marl[2] (märl), v. t. [Also marline; < ME. marlenn; < D. marlen (= LG. marlen, > G. marlen), fasten with marline; appar. irreg. developed from marlijn, marline: see marline, n. and v.] 1. Naut., to wind, as a rope, with marline, spun-yarn, twine, or other small stuff, every turn being secured by a sort of hitch: a common method of fastening strips of canvas called parceling, to prevent chafing.

I purchased here [St. John's, Newfoundland] a stock of fresh beef, which, after removing the bones and tendons, we compressed into rolls by wrapping it closely with twine, according to the nautical process of marling, and hung it up in the rigging.
Kane, Sec. Grinnell Exp., I. 20.

2. To ravel, as silk. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

marl[2] (märl), n. [< marl[2], v.] The fiber of those peacock-feathers which have the webs long and decomposed, so that the barbs stand apart, as if raveled: used for making artificial flies.

If there are any fibres of the hackle or wing standing in the wrong direction, clip them with scissors, and the fly is completed. Floss silk or peacock's marl may be used instead of mohair. Tribune Book of Sports, p. 146.

marl[3]†, v. t. [A contr. form of marvel.] To wonder; marvel. [Old or prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

marli (mär′li), n. [< F. marli; origin unknown.] 1. Quintin; specifically, embroidered quintin.—2. See marly[2].

Marlieria (mär-li-ē′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Cambessedes, 1829), named after G. T. Marlière, who introduced the culture of corn, rice, and coffee in certain parts of Brazil.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Myrtaceæ and the tribe Myrteæ. They are characterized by having the stamens inflexed or involute in the bud, the calyx-limb closed until torn open by the expansion of the flower, when it is crowned by five foliaceous lobes, and a 2-celled or rarely 3-celled ovary with two ovules in each cell. They are shrubs or trees with opposite, pinnately veined leaves, and small 4- or 5-parted flowers. About 70 species are recognized by recent authors; they are natives of tropical America. M. edulis of subtropical Brazil, there called cambuca, yields a fruit much used for food. M. tomentosa, of extratropical Brazil, the guaparanga, is a tall shrub which produces sweet berries.

marlin (mär′lin), n. [A var. of marling[1], merlin.] A godwit or a curlew. (a) The great marbled godwit, Limosa fedoa: more fully called horsefoot, common, brown, and red marlin. See cut under godwit. (b) The Hudsonian godwit, Limosa hæmastica, distinguished in some localities as the ring-tailed, white-tailed, or field marlin. (c) The Hudsonian curlew, Numenius hudsonicus: more fully called crooked-billed, hook-billed, and horsefoot marlin. [New Jersey.]

marline (mär′lin), n. [Also marlin, marling; = F. Sp. merlin = Pg. merlim, < D. marlijn, also irreg. marling, merling (= Fries. merlijne = MLG. merlink, marlink, LG. marlink = Sw. marl-pit (märl′pit), n. [< ME. marlepit, marlpytte, merlepitt; < marl[1] + pit[1].] A pit where marl is dug.

He was in a marlepit yfalle.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 274.

marl-slate (märl′slāt), n. Calcareous shale; a variety of marl splitting into thin plates. The marl-slate proper is a member of the magnesian limestone group of the Permian as developed in England, and is nearly the equivalent of the kupferschiefer of the Germans.

marl-stock (märl′stok), n. Same as marl-brick.

marlstone (märl′stōn), n. In geol., argillaceous and more or less ferruginous limestone. The middle of the three principal divisions of the Lias in England is called the Marlstone, a name first used by W. Smith. This is economically a highly important rock, since it contains the celebrated deposits of iron ore called the Cleveland, from the Cleveland hills, in which it occurs. The Middle Lias or Marlstone consists generally of two members, the upper one being the Marlstone proper, and the lower a series of sands, marls, and clays. The maximum thickness of the whole series is about 300 feet.

marly[1] (mär′li), a. [< ME. marly; < marl[1] + -y[1].] Resembling marl or partaking of its character; abounding with marl.

Lande is best for whete
If it be marly, thicke, and sumdele wete.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 10.

Marly clay, a variety of clay used in making pale bricks and as a manure.

marly[2] (mär′li), n. The rim of a dish, as distinguished from its cavetto. Also spelled marli.

marlyon†, n. An obsolete form of merlin.

marm, n. A vulgar mode of writing ma'am for madam.

marmalade (mär′ma-lād), n. [Formerly also marmelade, marmelad, marmelet; = D. G. Dan. marmelade = Sw. marmelad, < OF. marmelade, F. marmelade = It. marmellata = Sp. marmelada, < Pg. marmelada, marmalade, orig. a confection of quinces, < marmelo (= Sp. membrillo), a quince, < L. melimelum, a quince, < Gr. μελίμηλον, a sweet apple, an apple grafted on a quince.] A preserve or confection of pulpy consistence made from various fruits, especially bitter and acid fruits, such as the orange, lemon, and barberry, and the berries of the mountain-ash, and sometimes also the larger fruits, as the apple, pear, plum, pineapple, quince, etc.

All maner of fruits and confeccions, marmelad, succad, greene-gynger, comfiettes. Tyndale, Works, p. 229.

Every period in her style carrieth marmalad and sucket in the mouth. G. Harvey, New Letter.

After a good dinner, left Mrs. Hunt and my wife making a marmalett of quinces. Pepys, Diary, Nov. 2, 1663.

Marmalade-box. Same as genipap.—Natural marmalade, the fruit of the marmalade-tree.

marmalade-plum (mär′ma-lād-plum), n. The marmalade-tree, or its fruit.

marmalade-tree (mär′ma-lād-trē), n. A tree, Achras zapota, that yields a fruit the juice of which resembles marmalade. Also called mammee-sapota.

Marmalade-tree (Achras zapota).

marmalady (mär′ma-lā-di), a. [< marmalade + -y[1].] Like marmalade. [Rare.]

The Frenchman, you see, has a soft marmalady heart.
Middleton, Blurt, [Master-Constable, iii. i.

marmala-water (mär′ma-lā-wâ″tėr), n. [< Pg. marmelo, quince (see marmalade), + E. water.] A fragrant liquid distilled in Ceylon from the flowers of the Bengal quince, Belou Marmelos, much used by the natives as a perfume for sprinkling. Simmonds.

marmalet† (mär′ma-let), n. An obsolete form of marmalade.

marmarosis (mär-ma-rō′sis), n. [< Gr. μάρμαρος, marble (see marble), + -osis.] Conversion of limestone into marble by metamorphic agencies.

One of the most remarkable examples of marmarosis is the alteration of the (Triassic) limestone of Carrara into the well-known statuary marble.
A. Geikie, Text-Book of Geol. (2d ed.), p. 561.

marmatite (mär′ma-tīt), n. [= F. marmatite; as Marmato (see def.) + -ite[2].] A variety of sphalerite or zinc sulphid, containing considerable iron, and hence of a black color. The original, found at Marmato, near Popayan, in Colombia, contained 23 per cent. of sulphid of iron.

marmolite (mär′mō-līt), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μαρμαίρειν, glisten, + λίθος, stone.] A mineral of a pearly luster, a greenish color, and a laminated structure. It is a variety of serpentine.

marmoraceous (mär-mō-rā′shius), a. [< L. marmor, marble, + -aceous.] Pertaining to or like marble. Maunder.

marmorate (mär′mō-rāt), a. [< L. marmoratus, pp. of marmorare, overlay with marble, < marmor, marble: see marble.] 1†. Made like marble, or invested with marble as a covering. Compare marbled, marbleize.

Under this ston closyde and marmorate
Lyeth John Kitte, Londoner natyff.
Wood, Athenæ Oxon., I.

2. In bot., traversed with veins as in some kinds of marble.

marmorated† (mär′mō-rā-ted), a. Same as marmorate, 1.

marmoration (mär-mō-rā′shon), n. [= Sp. marmoración, < LL. marmoratio(n-), < L. marmorare, overlay with marble: see marmorate.] 1. A covering or incrusting with marble.—2. The act of variegating so as to give the appearance of marble; marbleizing. Blount. [Rare.]

marmoratum (mär-mō-rā′tum), n. [L., neut. of marmoratus, overlaid with marble: see marmorate.] In arch., a cement formed of pounded marble and lime mortar well beaten together. It was used by the ancient Romans in building terrace-walls, etc.

marmoreal (mär-mō′rē-al), a. [< L. marmoreus, of marble (< marmor, marble: see marble), + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling marble; having the properties of marble; marble-like.

The thronging constellations rush in crowds,
Paving with fire the sky and the marmoreal floods.
Shelley, Revolt of Islam, i. 49.

marmorean (mär-mō′rē-an), a. [As marmoreal + -an.] Same as marmoreal.

marmortinto (mär-mōr-tin′tō), n. [< It. marmore, marble, + tinto, tint: see marble and tint.] A process employed in the eighteenth century in decorating walls, ceilings, etc., in imitation of marble. It consisted in depositing on a ground of an adhesive nature marble-dust or -powder, arranged in the form of the veins of marble, or sometimes in ornamental patterns.

marmose (mär'mōs), n. [< F. marmose (Buffon); origin not ascertained; no appar. connection with marmoset.] One of several small Marmose (Didelphys dorsigera).

South American opossums which have the pouch rudimentary and carry the young on the back. Such are Didelphys dorsigera of Surinam, of the size of a rat, the still smaller D. murina, and other species.

marmoset (mär'mō-zet), n. [Formerly also marmozet; < ME. marmeset, "beeste, zinziphalus, cenozephalus [cynocephalus], mammonetus, marmonetus" (Prompt. Parv., p. 327), marmosette, a kind of ape (mentioned by Mandeville), also mermoyse (Caxton); < OF. marmoset, marmouset, F. marmouset, the cock of a cistern or fountain, an antic figure, a puppet, orig. a marble figure as an ornament to a fountain, irreg. with change of orig. r to s, as in chaire (> chaise: see chair, chaise), < ML. marmoretum, a marble figure, < L marmor, marble: see marble. The application of marmoset, 'an antic figure,' to an ape was prob. assisted by association with F. marmot, = It. marmotta, a marmoset, a monkey.] 1†. A little ape or monkey.

[I will] instruct thee how To snare the nimble marmoset.
Shak., Tempest, ii. 2. 174.

2. Now, specifically, a small squirrel-like South American monkey of the family Hapalidæ, or Midídæ (which see for technical characters). There are numerous species, referred to two leading genera, Hapale and Midas, and known by many names, as squirrel-monkeys, oustitis, tamarins, etc. They are the smallest of the monkey tribe, ranging from a few inches to a foot in length, with a long, bushy, non-prehensile tail, and thick, soft, silky or woolly fur, in some species lengthened into conspicuous ear-tufts or a kind of mane. The coloration is extremely variable. The thumb of the hand is not opposable, but the inner toe of the hind foot serves as a thumb, and has a flat nail, all the other digits of both extremities being armed with sharp claws of great service in climbing. Marmosets are confined to tropical America, having their center of abundance in northern South America; they live in the woods, and feed chiefly upon insects. They are extremely sensitive to cold, but with proper care may be kept in confinement, and make amusing pets, though their intelligence is low. Characteristic examples are the common black-eared marmoset, Hapale jacchus, and the marakina or tamarin, Midas rosalia. See cut under Hapale.

3†. An ugly little fellow; a conceited "puppy."

Some mincing marmoset,
Made all of clothes and face.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 2.

marmot (mär'mot), n. [Formerly marmotto (< It.); = D. marmot(-dier), < F. marmotte = Sp. Pg. marmota, < It. marmotto, marmotta, marmontana, < Romansch murmont = Sw. dial. murmet, < OHG. murmunto, muremunto, murmunti, murmenti, MHG. mürmendīn, G. murmel(-thier) = Dan. murmel(-dyr) = Sw. murmel(-djur); variously altered from ML. mus montanus, a marmot, lit. 'mountain mouse': see mouse and mountain.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the genus Arctomys; a bear-mouse, ground-hog, or woodchuck. There are several species, of Europe, Asia, and North America; they are the largest living representatives of the Sciuridæ, or squirrel family, of stout thickset form, with short bushy tail. They are terrestrial and fossorial, living in underground burrows, generally in open ground and often in communities, and hibernate in winter. The species to which the name was originally given is Arctomys marmotta or A. alpinus, inhabiting the Alps and Pyrenees. A. bobac is the Asiatic marmot, occurring also in parts of Europe, especially in Russia. North America has at least three species: the common woodchuck or ground-hog, A. monax, found abundantly in many parts of the United States and Canada; the yellow-bellied marmot of the Rocky Mountains, A. flaviventris; and the large hoary marmot or whistler of northwestern America, A. pruinosus. Besides the foregoing, some of the larger species of the related genera Cynomys and Spermophilus, which include the prairie-dogs and marmot-squirrels, are sometimes called marmots. See cut under Arctomys.

2. The Cape cony, Hyrax capensis: a misnomer. Kolbe, Vosmaer, Buffon, etc.—Earless marmot, the suslik, Spermophilus citillus.

Marmota (mär'mō-tä), n. [NL., < marmot.] Same as Arctomys. Blumenbach.

marmot-squirrel (mär'mot-skwur"el), n. Any animal of the genus Spermophilus; some kind of suslik. The species are numerous, especially in North America; and, as is implied in the name, they are intermediate in all respects between the arboreal squirrels on the one hand and the strictly terrestrial marmots on the other.

marmozet†, n. An obsolete form of marmoset.

marone† (ma-rōn'), n. An obsolete spelling of maroon[1].

Maronist (mar'ō-nist), n. [< L. Maro(n-), the family name of Virgil, + -ist.] A disciple of Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro); a Virgilian student or scholar.

Like some imperious Maronist.
Bp. Hall, Satires, I. vi. 7. (Davies.)

Maronite (mar'ō-nīt), n. [= F. Maronite; as Maron (see def.) + -ite[2].] One of a body of Syriac Christians dwelling chiefly in the mountains of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. They are named from St. Maron, a Syrian monk (about A. D. 400), or less probably from John Maron, patriarch of the sect in the seventh century. The Maronites were originally Monothelites, but they entered into a partial union with the Roman Catholic Church in 1182, which after an interruption was made closer in 1445 and again in 1596. They still retain their own patriarchate of Antioch (now seated at Kanobin), their Syriac liturgy (although Arabic is now their vernacular tongue), the marriage of priests, their traditional fast-days, and the use of both elements in lay communion. The Maronites as a tribe were formerly under the same local government as the Druses, with whom they have had some bloody conflicts. In 1861, after a severe outbreak, they were put under a separate governor.

★maroon[1] (ma-rön'), a. and n. [Formerly marone; also, as F., marron; < F. marron, a chestnut, chestnut-color, also a fire-cracker, maroon (II., 4), < It. marrone, formerly marone, a chestnut; origin unknown. Cf. MGr. μάραον or μάραος, the fruit of the cornel-tree.] I. a. Very dark crimson or red. See II., 2.—Maroon oxid. Same as purple brown (which see, under brown).

II. n. 1. A kind of sweet chestnut produced in southern Europe, and known elsewhere as the French or Italian chestnut, having a single kernel and attaining a large size from the fact that the other two seeds of the involucre or bur are abortive. It is largely used for food by the poor in the countries where it is produced.

A. I will eate three or foure chestnuts; what will you do?
P. They like me so, so . . . if they be marones or great chestnuts, they would be the better.
Benvenuto, Passenger's Dialogues (1612). (Nares.)

2. A generic name for any pure or crimson red of very low luminosity. The color of a chestnut is yellower.—3. In dyeing, a coal-tar coloring matter obtained by purifying the resinous matters formed in the manufacture of magenta.—4. In pyrotechnics, a small cubical box of pasteboard filled with gunpowder and wrapped round with two or three layers of strong twine, used to imitate the report of a cannon. Maroons are primed with a short piece of quick-match, inserted in a hole punctured in one of the corners, and are usually exploded in batteries to produce the effect of cannonading, as in combinations of fireworks. Also marron.

Some of these sounds were produced by rockets, some by a 24-pound howitzer, and some by an 8-inch maroon.
John Tyndall, in Pop. Sci. Mo., July, 1878, p. 282.

Purple maroon, a very dark magenta or crimson color. A color-disk composed of 90 parts of velvet-black, 5 of pure red, and 5 of artificial ultramarine gives a purple maroon.

maroon[2] (ma-rön'), n. and a. [Also rarely marroon; < F. marron, abbr. by apheresis (the syllable si- being perhaps mistaken for a F. word) < simarron (> obs. E. symaron) for cimarron*, < Sp. cimarrón (= Pg. cimarrão), wild, unruly, fugitive (Cuban negro cimarron, or simply cimarron, a fugitive negro), appar. orig. 'living on the mountain-tops,' < cima (= Pg. It. cima = F. cime), a mountain-top, orig. a sprout, twig, < L. cyma, a sprout, < Gr. κῦμα, a sprout: see cyma, cyme.] I. n. 1. One of a class of negroes, originally fugitive slaves, living in the wilder parts of the West Indies and of Guiana. In both of these localities they were often at war with the whites. In Dutch Guiana, where they are called bush-negroes, they still form a large independent community. They are pagan and have preserved many primitive industries and customs.

2. One who is left on a desolate island as a punishment.

"I'm Ben Gunn, I am," replied the maroon, wriggling like an eel in his embarrassment.
R. L. Stevenson, Treasure Island, xxxiii.

3. [< maroon[2], v.] A hunting- or fishing-trip or -excursion. [Southern U. S.]

II. a. Same as feral[1], 2.

maroon[2] (ma-rön'), v. [< maroon[2], n.] I. trans. To put ashore and leave on a desolate island by way of punishment, as was done by the buccaneers, etc.

It was between ten a Clock and one when I began to find that I was (as we call it, I suppose from the Spaniards) Morooned, or Lost, and quite out of the Hearing of my Comrades Guns. Dampier, Voyages, II. ii. 84.

II. intrans. In the southern United States, to camp out after the manner of the West Indian maroons; make a pleasure-excursion of some duration, with provision for living in camp.

"Really, this is a fine country," said Robert, referring . . . to the abundant marooning dinner.
Goulding, Young Marooners, p. 105.

A marooning party . . . is a party made up to pass several days on the shore or in the country.
Bartlett, Americanisms, p. 384.

marooner (ma-rö'nėr), n. 1. A runaway slave; a maroon.

On the south shore dwelt a marooner, that modestly called himself a hermit. Byrd, Westover Papers, p. 13.

2. One who goes marooning; a member of a marooning party. See maroon[2], v. i. [Southern U. S.]

maroquin† (mar-ō-kēn'), n. [F.: see morocco.] Morocco; goat's leather.

At the end of it [the gallery] is the Duke of Orlean's library, well furnished with excellent bookes, all bound in maroquin and gilded. Evelyn, Diary, April 1, 1644.

A large sofa covered with black maroquin.
Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, x. 7.

marotte (ma-rot'), n. [F.] A fool's bauble.

marplot (mär'plot), n. [< mar[1], v., + obj. plot[2].] One who by officious interference mars or defeats a design or plot; one who blunderingly hinders the success of any undertaking or project.

If we will not be mar-plots with our miserable interferences, the work, the society, letters, arts, science, religion of men would go on far better than now.
Emerson, Spiritual Laws, Essays, 1st ser., p. 125.

Marprelate controversy. [The name Marprelate was assumed as indicating the animus of the writers; < mar[1], v., + obj. prelate.] A discussion carried on in a series of pamphlets attacking prelacy, issued in England by the Puritans "in 1588–9, at the cost and charge" of one bearing the pseudonym of "Martin Marprelate, gent." These pamphlets were printed secretly, the press used for the purpose being carried about from place to place to escape seizure. John Penry, Udall, and others are supposed to have been the writers of the tracts.

marque (märk), n. [< OF. marque, merque, F. marque (ML. marca, marcha), seizure or arrest by warrant (lettre de marque, a warrant of seizure), a particular use of marque, a mark, stamp, official stamp: see mark[1].] Seizure.—Letter of marque, usually in the plural, letters of marque (formerly also letters of mark or mart, also scripts of mart), or letters of marque and reprisal. (a) Originally, a commission granted by the supreme authority of a state to a subject, empowering him to enter an enemy's territory and capture the goods or persons of the enemy in return for goods or persons taken by him. (b) In present usage, a license or extraordinary commission granted by a sovereign or the supreme power of a state to its citizens to make reprisals at sea on the subjects of another, under pretense of indemnification for injuries received—that is, a license to engage in privateering. Letters of marque were abolished among European nations by the treaty of Paris of 1856. The United States declined to accede to this agreement, but proposed that all innocent private property at sea be exempt from seizure by public armed vessels in time of war.

Divers Letters of Mart are granted our Merchants, and Letters of Mart are commonly the Forerunners of a War.
Howell, Letters, I. iv. 3.

All men of war, with scripts of mart that went,
And had command the coast of France to keep,
The coming of a navy to prevent.
Drayton, Battle of Agincourt. (Nares.)

Hence—(c) A private vessel commissioned to attack and capture the vessels of an enemy; a privateer.

marquee (mär-kē'), n. [Also markee; an assumed sing. from the supposed pl. marquees*, an E. spelling of F. marquise, an awning or canopy, as over a doorway or an entrance, < marquise, a marchioness: see marquise.] A tent of unusual size and elaborateness; an officer's field-tent; hence, a large tent or wooden structure erected for a temporary purpose, such as to accommodate a dinner-party on some public occasion.

Major Worth's marquee was pitched on the angle of the redoubt thrown up during the night previous to the famous battle. Josiah Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 90.

I remember well during the War standing by the General's markee half the night. S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 7.

marquess, n. See marquis.

marqueterie, n. See marquetry.

marquetry (mär'ket-ri), n.; pl. marquetries (-riz). [< F. marqueterie, < marqueter, spot, inlay, < marque, a mark: see mark[1].] An inlay of some thin material in the surface of a piece of furniture or other object. The most common material is a veneer of wood; such veneers are often stained green, dark-red, and other colors. Ivory, tortoise-shell, etc., are sometimes combined with these.

The royal apartments were richly adorned with tapestry and marquetry. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xx.

marquis, marquess (mär'kwis, -kwes, orig. mär'kis, -kes), n. [Also dial. markis (the proper historical form); formerly also marquesse (and, in ref. to Italian use, marchese); < ME. markis, < OF. markis, marquis, F. marquis = Pr. marques, marquis = Sp. marqués = Pg. marquez = It. marchese, < ML. marchensis, a prefect of a frontier town, later as a title of nobility, < marcha, marca, a frontier, march: see march[1], mark[1].] In Great Britain and France, and in other countries where corresponding titles exist, a nobleman whose rank is intermediate between that of an earl or count and that of a duke. A marquis was originally an officer charged with the government of a march or frontier territory; the title as an honorary dignity was first bestowed in England in 1386. Dukes have commonly the secondary title of marquis, which is used as the courtesy-title of their eldest sons. The wife of a marquis is styled marchioness. The coronet of an English marquis consists of a richly chased circle of gold, with four strawberry-leaves alternating with four balls or large pearls set on short points on its edge; the cap is of crimson velvet, with a gold tassel on the top, and turned up with ermine. See cut under coronet[2].

A markis whilom lord was of that londe.

marriage (mar'āj), n. [< ME. mariage, < OF. (and F.) mariage = Pr. maridatge, mariatge = Sp. maridaje = It. maritaggio, < ML. maritaticum, marriage, < maritus, a husband, marita, a wife: see marital, marry[1].] 1. The legal union of a man with a woman for life; the state or condition of being married; the legal relation of spouses to each other; wedlock. In this sense marriage is a status or condition which, though originating in a contract, is not capable of being terminated by the parties' rescission of the contract, because the interests of the state and of children require the affixing of certain permanent duties and obligations upon the parties.

2. The formal declaration or contract by which a man and a woman join in wedlock. In this sense marriage is a civil contract, implying the free and intelligent mutual consent of competent persons to take each other, as a present act, as husband and wife; and according to the modern and most prevalent view no formalities other than such as the law of the jurisdiction may expressly impose are necessary to prevent either from subsequently repudiating the other or denying the legitimacy of their issue. The formalities provided for by the law of some of the United States are optional, being intended chiefly to enable the parties to preserve authentic evidence of the contract. When a man and a woman live and cohabit together, and conduct themselves as man and wife in the society and neighborhood of which they are members, till the belief and reputation that they are married become general, their marriage is presumed, without other evidence, for purposes of enforcing rights and liabilities of third persons.

O, Hamlet, what a falling off was there!
From me, whose love was of that dignity
That it went hand in hand even with the vow
I made to her in marriage. Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 50.

Marriage is an engagement entered into by mutual consent, and has for its end the propagation of the species.
Hume, Of Polygamy and Divorces.

3. The celebration of a marriage; a wedding.

The kingdom of heaven is like unto a certain king, which made a marriage for his son. Mat. xxii. 2.

About this time there was a marriage betwixt Iohn Laydon and Anne Burras.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 204.

4†. A marriage vow or contract.

That wommen kan nat kepe hir mariage.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 710.

5. Intimate union; a joining as if in marriage. The figure is used in the Bible to represent the close union of God or Christ and the chosen people or church. See Isa. liv. 5; Hos. ii. 19, 20.

The marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. Rev. xix. 7.

Let me not to the marriage of true minds Admit impediments. Shak., Sonnets, cxvi.

They plant their Vines at the foote of great Trees, which marriage proueth very fruitfull.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 342.

6. In various card-games, as bezique, the possession in one hand of the king and queen.—Avail of marriage. See avail[1].—Civil marriage, a marriage ceremony conducted by officers of the state, as distinguished from one solemnized by a clergyman.—Clandestine marriage. See clandestine.—Communal marriage, a kind of general or multiplex state of marriage, in which "every man and woman in a small community were regarded as equally married to one another" (H. Spencer), existing among some primitive races, and imitated for a time, but afterward abandoned, by the members of the Oneida Community.—Consummation of marriage. See consummation.—Cross-marriages. See cross[1].—Danish marriage, a term used to designate a matrimonial relation recognized by the early Danish law, by which a concubine who had publicly lived with a man and shared his table for three years, or winters, was deemed a lawful wife.—Diriment impediments of marriage. See diriment.—Dissenters' Marriages Act. See dissenter.—Fleet marriages. See fleet[3].—Jactitation of marriage. See jactitation.—Left-handed marriage. See morganatic.—Marriage articles, or marriage contract, an antenuptial agreement; an instrument made between the parties to a contemplated marriage, embodying the terms agreed on between them respecting rights of property and succession. The law, while it does not allow the parties to modify by agreement the personal rights and duties of the married state, does allow them to modify the resulting effects of that state on rights of property.—Marriage brokage, the service, or compensation for the service, of negotiating a marriage contract between third persons.—Marriage contract, or contract of marriage. (a) A pre-contract of marriage; the preliminary or promissory engagement of marriage. (b) A marriage itself. (c) Same as marriage articles.—Marriage favors, knots of ribbons or bunches of flowers, usually white, worn at weddings.—Marriage license, a permit or certificate of competency required by the law of some jurisdictions to be procured from a public officer before marriage. See under license.—Marriage lines. See line[2], n.—Marriage portion. See portion.—Marriage settlement, an arrangement, usually made before marriage and in consideration of it, whereby a jointure is secured to the wife, and it may be portions to the children, in the event of the husband's death.—Morganatic marriage. See morganatic.—Plural marriage, the marriage of a man with two or more women; polygamy: applied especially to the kind of polygamy existing among the Mormons, without the accompaniment of the harem of Oriental countries, each wife usually living in a separate house.—Polygamous marriage. See polygamy.—Putative marriage. See putative.—Scotch marriage, a marriage by mutual agreement, without formal solemnization, the parties declaring that they presently do take each other for husband and wife: so called because such marriages are recognized by Scotch law.

=Syn. 1-3. Marriage, Wedding, Nuptials, Matrimony, Wedlock. Marriage is the act of forming or entering into the union, or the union itself. Wedding generally includes the ceremonies and festivities attending the celebration of the union or marriage, but not essential to it; marriages are often made without such ceremonies. Nuptials is more formal than wedding: we speak of the nuptials of a prince. Matrimony is the married state, or the state into which a couple are brought by marriage. Wedlock is the vernacular English word for matrimony, not differing from it in meaning, but being the ordinary term in law: as, born in wedlock.

marriageable (mar'āj-ą-bl), a. [< marriage + -able.] Capable of marrying; fit or competent to marry; of an age suitable for marriage: as, a marriageable man or woman; a person of marriageable age or condition.

They led the vine
To wed her elm; she, spousèd, about him twines
Her marriageable arms, and with her brings Her dower. Milton, P. L., v. 217.

marrow[1] (mar'ō), n. [Also dial. marry, mary; < ME. marow, merow, mary, margh, merg, < AS. mearg, mearh = OS. marg = OFries. merch, merg = D. marg, merg = MLG. merch, LG. march, merch = OHG. marag, marg, MHG. marc, G. mark = Icel. mergr = Sw. märg, merg = Dan. marv = W. mer = Corn. maru = OBulg. Russ. mozgŭ = Zend mazga = Skt. majjan, marrow; perhaps < Skt. √ majj = L. mergere, dip: see merge.] 1. A soft tissue found in the interior of bones, both in the cylindrical hollow of the long bones and in the hollows of cancellated bony structures; the medulla or medullary matter of bone. It varies greatly in different situations. Ordinary marrow of the shafts of adult bones, as the humerus and femur, is a soft yellow solid, consisting of about 95 per cent. of fat. The red marrow of various bones, vertebral, cranial, sternal, and costal, is softer, and contains very few fat-cells, but numerous marrow-cells and cells resembling the nucleated red corpuscles of the embryo. The so-called spinal marrow, or medulla spinalis, is the spinal cord, the central axis of the nervous system, a tissue of an entirely different character, not found in the hollow of a bone, but in the cavity running through the chain of vertebræ.

Out of the harde bones knokke they
The mary, for they caste nought awey.
Chaucer, Pardoner's Tale, l. 80.

Herr Forström prepared us for the journey by a good breakfast of reindeer's marrow, a justly celebrated Lapland delicacy. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 111.

Her seede in meth III daies yf me steep,
Other in ewes mylk as longe hem wete.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 121.

4. Figuratively, the inner substance; the essence; the essential strength; the inner meaning, purpose, etc.; the pith.

He never leaveth searching till he come at the bottom, the pith, the quick, the life, the spirit, the marrow, and very cause why.
Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc. 1850), p. 6.

It takes
From our achievements, though perform'd at height,
The pith and marrow of our attribute.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 4. 22.

He never pierces the marrow of your habits.
Lamb, My Relations.

For this, thou shalt from all things suck
Marrow of mirth and laughter.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

Vegetable marrow. (a) A kind of gourd, a variety of Cucurbita Pepo, the oblong fruit of which is used as a vegetable in England. (b) The alligator-pear. See avocado.

marrow[1] (mar′ō), v. t. [< marrow[1], n.] To fill with marrow or with fat. [Rare.]

Quarles, Judgement and Mercy, The Drunkard. (Latham.)

He was fresh-sinewed every joint,
Each bone new-marrowed as whom gods anoint Though mortal to their rescue. Browning, Sordello.

marrow[2] (mar′ō), n. [< ME. marowe, marwe; origin obscure. Cf. moral[2], which is perhaps a corruption of marrow[2].] A companion or mate; an associate; an intimate friend; a fellow; hence, one of a pair of either persons or things; a match: as, your knife 's the very marrow o' mine. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Birds of a fethere best fly together,
Then like partners about your market goe;
Marrowes adew; God send you fayre wether.
Promos and Cassandra, I. ii. 4. (Nares.)

If I see all, ye're nine to ane;
An that's an unequal marrow.
The Dowy Dens of Yarrow (Child's Ballads, III. 67).

Busk ye, busk ye, my bonnie, bonnie bride!
Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow!
W. Hamilton, Braes of Yarrow.

marrow[2] (mar′ō), v. t. [< marrow[2], n.] To associate with; hence, to match; fit. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

marrow[3]†, a. [< ME. marowe, merowe,* < AS. mearu (mearw-, merw-, mærw-, myrw-) = OHG. marawi, maro, MHG. mar (marw-) (also, with variation, MD. murwe, morwe, D. murw = OHG. muruwi, murwi, MHG. mürwe, mür, G. mürbe), soft. Cf. mellow.] Soft; tender.

marrow-bone (mar′ō-bōn), n. [Formerly also and still dial. mary-bone; < ME. marwe-bon, marie bone;* < marrow[1] + bone[1]. The conjecture that marrow-bones, in the second sense, is a "corruption of Mary-bones, in allusion to the reverence paid to the Virgin Mary by kneeling," is absurd. The use is doubtless a mere whimsical application of the word.] 1. A bone containing fat or edible marrow. See marrow[1], 1.

A cook thei hadde with hem for the nones,
To boylle chyknes with the mary bones,
And pondre-marchant tart, and galyngale.

Marry trap†. A doubtful phrase, apparently an error (for marry gap?) in the following passage:

Be avised, sir, and pass good humours: I will say marry trap with you, if you run the nuthook's humour on me.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 170.

marrying (mar′i-ing), p. a. Disposed to marry; in a condition to marry.—Marrying man, a man likely or disposed to marry.

I don't think he's a marrying man.
Trollope, Dr. Thorne, vi.

I think Miss Anville the loveliest of her sex; and, were I a marrying man, her, of all the women I have seen, I would fix upon for a wife. Mme. D'Arblay, Evelina, letter lxxvi.

marrymuffe†(mar′i-muf), n. 1. A garment mentioned in 1640.—2. A material, apparently an inexpensive and rough stuff, for men's wear.

Mars (märz), n. [L. Mars (Mart-), OL. Mavors (Mavort-); also Marmar, Oscan Mamers (Mamert-), Mars.] 1. A Latin deity, identified at an early period by the Romans with the Greek Ares, with whom he had originally no connection. He was principally worshiped as the god of war, and as such bore the epithet Gradivus; but he was earlier regarded as a patron of agriculture, which procured him the title of Silvanus, and as the protector of the Roman state, in virtue of which he was called Quirinus. In works of art Mars is generally represented as of a youthful but powerful figure, armed with the helmet, shield, and spear; in other examples he is bearded and heavily armed. See cut under Ares.

The mailed Mars shall on his altar sit Up to the ears in blood.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 117.

2. The planet next outside the earth in the solar system. Its diameter (about 4,200 miles) is only 0.53 that of the earth, its superficies 0.28, and its volume 0.147. Its mean density is 0.71 that of the earth, so that the density of its crust may very likely be about the same as the earth's; but the weight of a given mass at the surface of Mars is only three eighths of the weight of the same mass on the earth. The strength of materials is therefore relatively much greater there, and mountains, animals, and buildings would naturally be much larger. The mean distance from the sun is 141,500,000 miles. The eccentricity of its orbit is very much greater than that of the earth, being 0.093 in place of 0.017; the inclination of its equator to its orbit is about the same. Its day is half an hour longer than ours. Its year is 687 of our days. The surface of Mars has been carefully mapped, and is characterized by the predominance of land and the great number of canals or straits. Its color is strikingly red. As to its temperature and climate widely divergent views prevail. It has two moons, discovered by Professor Asaph Hall in Washington in 1877, conformably to the prediction of Kepler, and realizing the fancies of Swift and of Voltaire. The inner of these, Phobos, revolves in less than 8 hours, so that to an observer on the planet it rises in the west and sets in the east; the outer, Deimos, revolves in 30 hours, so that it appears nearly stationary for a long time. The symbol of Mars is ♂, which seems to show the shield and spear of the god. A planetoid, Eros, has been discovered whose orbit falls partly within that of Mars.

They have discovered two lesser stars, or satellites, which revolve about Mars, whereof the innermost . . . revolves in the space of ten hours, and the outermost in twenty-one and a half. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, III. iii.

3†. In old chem., iron.—4. In her., the tincture red, when blazoning is done by the planets: see blazon.—Mars brown, yellow, etc. See the nouns.

Marsala (mär-sä′lä), n. [See def.] A class of white wines produced in Sicily, especially in the region about Marsala on the western coast. There are many brands, of which the best possess a very delicate flavor and have a general resemblance to Madeira, but are usually lighter.

marsbanker†, marsbunker†, n. Obsolete forms of mossbunker.

Marsdenia (märs-dē′ni-ä), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1811), named after William Marsden (1754–1836), a British orientalist.] A genus of plants of the family Asclepiadaceæ, the milkweed family, type of the tribe Marsdenieæ. It is characterized by having the crown adnate to the stamen-tube, and composed of five flat scales which are free at the apex, and by a subrotate, campanulate, or urn-shaped corolla, with the lobes convolute to the right, or rarely subvalvate. They are twining shrubs, rarely suberect, with opposite leaves, and small or medium-sized purplish-green or whitish flowers, growing in terminal or axillary umbrella-shaped cymes. There are about 55 species, natives of the warmer regions of the globe. M. tenacissima of India yields the valuable jetee-fiber. (See jetee.) M. tinctoria, also East Indian, produces a blue dye, whence it is called indigo-plant. The milky juice of M. erecta, of southeastern Europe, raises blisters on the skin, and taken internally is a violent poison. M. suaveolens of Australia is named fragrant bower-plant, and M. viridiflora is the native potato of New South Wales. See cundurango.

Marsdenieæ (märs-dē-nī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Marsdenia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Asclepiadaceæ. The anthers are usually terminated by a hyaline or rarely opaque membrane, which is inflexed over the disk of the stigma or is suberect. It is practically the same as the subtribe Marsdeniinæ of Engler's system in the tribe Tylophoreæ. The tribe embraces 40 genera and over 350 species, found throughout the world.

Marseillais, Marseillaise (mär-se-lyā', mär-se-lyāz' or mär-se-lāz'), a. and n. [F., masc. and fem. (< L. Massiliensis), < Marseille (> E. Marseilles), < L. Massilia, < Gr. Μασσαλία, a town in Gallia Narbonensis settled by a Greek colony from Phocæa, now Marseilles. Cf. Massilian.]

I. a. Belonging or pertaining to Marseilles, one of the chief seaports of France, situated on the Mediterranean.—Marseillaise Hymn, or The Marseillaise, the national song of the French republic, written in April, 1792, by Rouget de Lisle, an officer of engineers at Strasburg, and called by him War-Song of the Army of the Rhine. The Parisians first heard it sung by a band of patriots from Marseilles, and gave it the name by which it has since been known. Rouget de Lisle himself asserted that he wrote both the words and the music in one night. His authorship of the former has never been disputed; that of the latter has frequently been, but apparently on quite insufficient grounds.

II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of the city of Marseilles.—2. The Marseillaise Hymn. See I.

marseilles (mär-sālz'), n. [So called from Marseilles in France.] A cotton fabric similar to piqué, stiff, and used for men's waistcoats and summer garments.—Marseilles quilt. See counterpane[1].

marsella (mär-sel'ä), n. [Cf. marseilles (?).] A kind of twilled linen. E. H. Knight.

Marsenia (mär-sē'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Leach, 1820).] A genus of gastropods, typical of the family Marseniidæ.

Marseniidæ (mär-sē-nī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Marsenia + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate pectinibranchiate gastropods, typified by the genus Marsenia. They possess a characteristic protrusible rostrum. They have a large thick mantle, a depressed truncate head with tentacles rising from its angles, eyes sessile at the outer base of the tentacles, and the teeth of the radula in three or seven rows. The rachidian tooth has a recurved unicuspid or denticulate apex. The shell is small and mostly entirely internal. The species inhabit all seas, and nearly 40 of them are known. Most, if not all, bore holes in ascidians and sponges to deposit their ova, and then cover the holes with special lids. Nearly all are diœcious, but a few are monœcious or hermaphrodite. Also called Marseniadæ, Lamellariidæ.

marsenioid (mär-sē'ni-oid), a. and n. [< Marsenia + -oid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Marseniidæ.

★ II. n. A member of the Marseniidæ.

marsh (märsh), n. [Also dial. mash; < ME. mersh, mersch, < AS. mersc, mærsc, merisc (= MD. mersche, maersche = MLG. mersch, marsch, masch, LG. marsch, > G. marsch = Dan. marsk), a marsh, wet ground, prob. orig. 'a place full of pools,' < mere, a lake, pool, + -isc, E. -ish[1]: see mere[1] and -ish[1]. (Cf. mensk, in which the same suffix appears as a noun-formative.) See marish, an equiv. word of different history.] A tract of water-soaked or partially overflowed land; wet, miry, or swampy ground; a piece of low ground usually more or less wet by reason of overflow, or scattered pools, but often nearly or wholly dry in certain seasons; a swamp; a fen. Low land subject to overflow by the tides is called salt-marsh or tide-marsh.

> And on the hyest of these hylles, and on the playn of these valeys, there were meruaylouse great marshes and daungerous passages.
> Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I. xviii.

> A marsh here is what would in England be called a meadow, with this difference, that in our marshes, until partially drained, a growth of tea-trees (Leptospermum) and rushes usually encumbers them. . . . Such is our marsh—a fine meadow of 180 or 200 acres, and green in the driest season.
> Mrs. Charles Meredith, My Home in Tasmania, p. 119.

Marsh bent. See bent[2]. =Syn. Bog, Quagmire, Slough, Swamp, Marsh, Morass, Fen, Moor. Excepting moor, these words agree in denoting wet ground. A bog is characterized by vegetation, decayed and decaying, and a treacherous softness. A quagmire or quag is the worst kind of bog or slough; it has depths of mud, and perhaps a shaking surface. A slough is a place of deep mud, and perhaps water, but generally no vegetation. Slough, quagmire, and swamp are the most suggestive of sinking in the mire. Swamp is rather broad in meaning, but a swamp is usually occupied by trees, and too wet to allow of agriculture or pasturage. In the United States, however, swamp is often used in the restricted sense of 'fresh-water marsh.' A marsh is frequently or periodically very wet, as the salt-marshes that are soaked by high tides; it may or may not be able to produce marsh-grass or small trees. A morass is the worst kind of marsh, large and too wet for valuable productiveness. A fen is a marsh abounding in coarse vegetation; a moor may or may not be wet, its distinguishing mark being the absence of forests. Fen and moor are little used in the United States.

marshal[1] (mär'shal), n. [Formerly also marshall, mareschal, etc.; < ME. marshal, marschal, marschalle, mareschalle, < OF. mareschal, marescal, F. maréchal = Pr. manescal = Sp. Pg. mariscal = It. mariscalco, maniscalco, maliscalco, a marshal, a farrier, < ML. marescalcus, marschalcus, mariscalus, marscalus, < OHG. marahscalh, MHG. marschalc, a groom, a master of the horse, a marshal (also MHG. marschal, G. marschall (after F.), a marshal) (= MLG. marschalk, a farrier, blacksmith, marshal, = MD. maerschalk, a farrier, a marshal, D. maarschalk, a marshal; cf. Sw. marskalk = Dan. marskal, a marshal, < LG. or G.), lit. 'horse-servant,' < marah (= AS. mearh), a horse, + scalh (= Goth. skalks), a servant: see mare[1] and shalk.] 1. An officer charged with the duty of regulating processions and ceremonies, deciding on points of precedence, and maintaining order: applied generally to such officers throughout the middle ages and in more recent times, usually with some explanatory term: as, marshal of the palace; marshal of the lists. The functions of the king's groom or farrier in various European countries were extended till the royal marshal became one of the highest military and civil officers; and the title of marshal was applied, with qualifications, to a large number of officers having similar duties. In England the king's marshal (along with the royal constable till the time of Henry VIII., and afterward alone) had charge of the ordering of arms, and of all matters of chivalry and knighthood, etc.; and he is still represented by the hereditary earl marshal (which see, under earl).

> A semely man oure hoste was withalle,
> For to han been a marshal in an halle.
> Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 752.

> The office of a connynge vschere or marshalle with-owt fable > Must know alle estates of the church goodly & greable,
> And the excellent estates of a kynge with his blode honorable.
> Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 185.

> Reason becomes the marshal to my will.
> Shak., M. N. D., ii. 2. 120.

> Unask'd the royal grant; no marshal by,
> As knightly rites require; nor judge to try?
> Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 259.

2. A military officer of high rank, usually the highest under the chief of the state or the minister of war. In many countries the title is commonly modified by some other term: thus, in England, it has the form field-marshal; in Germany, feldmarschall; in France, maréchal de France.

3. In the United States, a civil officer appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in each judicial district, as the executive or administrative officer (corresponding to the sheriff of a county) for the United States Supreme Court, and for the circuit and district courts within his district. There are also marshals for the consular courts in China, Japan, Siam, and Turkey. United States marshals were formerly charged with the duty of taking the national census in their districts; the officers who take the State census in certain States are called marshals or census marshals.

4. An officer of any private society appointed to regulate its ceremonies and execute its orders.—5. In some universities, as in Cambridge, England, an officer attendant upon the chancellor or his deputy.—Earl marshal. See earl.—Marshal of France (maréchal de France), the highest French military dignitary, the rank being conferred in recognition of services of special brilliancy in the field, as the winning of a pitched battle, or the taking of two fortified places. As the law has stood since 1839, the number of holders of the marshalship must not be raised beyond six in time of peace, but may be increased to twelve in time of war. The office has existed since the early middle ages. Originally subordinate to the constables of France, since the reign of Francis I. the title of marshal of France has had the importance which it still retains.—Marshal of the field†, one who presided over any outdoor game. Halliwell.—Marshal of the hall†, the person who, at public festivals, placed every one according to his rank. It was his duty also to preserve peace and order. Halliwell.—Marshal of the King's (or Queen's) Bench, formerly, an officer who had the custody of the prison called the King's (or Queen's) Bench, in Southwark. The act 5 and 6 Vict., c. xxii., abolished this office, and substituted an officer who is called keeper of the Queen's prison.—Marshal of the king's (or queen's) household. Same as knight marshal (which see, under knight).—Marshal's staff, a baton, variously proportioned, forming the badge of office of a marshal; especially, the long baton of the earl marshal of England. Two of them appear in the arms of the Duke of Norfolk, who holds the office of earl marshal as a hereditary right. They are crossed in saltier behind the shield, the ends only showing, and are represented as plain round staves, or capped at each end by heads of slightly conical form, sable.—Provost marshal. See provost.

marshal[1] (mär'shal), v. t.; pret. and pp. marshaled or marshalled, ppr. marshaling or marshalling. [< marshal[1], n.] 1. To dispose or set in order; arrange methodically; array.

> Nay, I know you can better marshal these affairs than I can.
> B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, i. 1.

> Then marshall'd feast
> Served up in hall with sewers and seneschals.
> Milton, P. L., ix. 37.

Specifically—(a) To draw up in battle array; review, as troops.

> False wizard, avaunt! I have marshall'd my clan;
> Their swords are a thousand, their bosoms are one!
> Campbell, Lochiel's Warning.

> There was no want of old soldiers who were quite capable of marshalling the recruits.
> Lecky, Eng. in 18th Century, xvii

(b) To order, as a procession.

2. To lead in a desired course; train; discipline.

> With feeble steps from marshalling his vines > Returning sad. Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey.

3. To act as a marshal to; lead as harbinger or guide; usher.

> Thou marshall'st me the way that I was going.
> Shak., Macbeth, ii. 1. 42.

> Our conquering swords shall marshal us the way.
> Marlowe, Tamburlaine, I., iii. 3.

> They marshalled him to the castle-hall,
> Where the guests stood all aside.
> Scott, Marmion, i. 12.

4. In her., to dispose (as more than one distinct coat of arms upon a shield) so as to form a single composition; group, as two or more distinct shields, so as to form a single composition; also, to associate (such accessories as the helm, mantling, crest, etc., and knightly and other insignia) with a shield of arms, thus again forming a single heraldic composition.—5. To arrange (the cars of a freight-train) in proper station order. Car-Builder's Dict. [Eng.]—To marshal assets or securities, to arrange the order of liability of or charge upon several parcels of property or several funds to which a claimant has a right to resort for payment of his demand. For example: A and B have a claim upon two funds, C has a claim upon one of them only. A and B can be compelled to satisfy themselves out of the fund to which C has not access, before resorting to the other, which constitutes the only source of payment for him.

Marshaling.—Escutcheon of Elizabeth, Queen of Henry VII.

marshal[2]†, a. A common old spelling of martial as confused with marshal[1].

marshalcy (mär'shal-si), n. [Formerly also marshalcie, marshalsie, < ME. marshalcie, < OF. mareschalcie, marshalship, < mareschal, marshal: see marshal[1] and -cy.] The office, rank, or position of a marshal.

> Thin office forego of the marschalcie.
> Rob. of Brunne, p. 292.

marshaler, marshaller (mär'shal-ėr), n. One who marshals or disposes in due order.

> Dryden was the great refiner of English poetry, and the best marshaller of words.
> Trapp, Pref. to Trans. of Æneid. (Latham.) marshalman (mär'shal-man), n.; pl. marshalmen (-men). A marshal; a marshal's officer.

> Marshalman. Stand back, keep a clear lane.
> Tennyson, Queen Mary, i. 1.

marshalsea (mär'shal-sē), n. [A corruption of marshalcy (which see).] In England—(a) The seat or court of the marshal of the royal household. (b) [cap.] A prison in Southwark, London, under the jurisdiction of the marshal of the royal household. It was abolished in 1842, and the prisoners, together with those from the Fleet prison, were placed in the Queen's Bench prison (known as the Queen's prison until its discontinuance in 1862).—Court of Marshalsea, a court formerly held before the steward and marshal of the royal household of England, to administer justice between the domestic servants of the king or queen. In the Marshalsea there were two courts of record—(1) the original court of the Marshalsea, which held plea of all trespasses committed within the verge—that is, within a circle of 12 miles round the sovereign's residence; and (2) the palace-court, created by Charles I., and abolished in 1849.

marshalship (mär'shal-ship), n. [< marshal + -ship.] The office or dignity of a marshal; the state of being a marshal; also, the term of office of a marshal.

The Duke of Norfolk, with the rod of marshalship, a coronet on his head.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 1, Order of Coronation, 7.

marshbanker† (märsh′bang″kėr), n. An obsolete form of mossbunker.

marsh-beetle (märsh′ bē″tl), n. [< marsh + *beetle*1.] The cattail or reedmace, Typha latifolia. Also marish-beetle, marsh-pestle.

marsh-bellflower (märsh′bel″flou-ėr), n. A plant, Campanula aparinoides, growing in bogs and wet meadows of North America.

marsh-blackbird (märsh′blak″bėrd), n. An American blackbird of the subfamily Agelæinæ, and especially of the genus Agelæus, of which there are several species, chiefly inhabiting marshes. See cut under Agelæinæ.

marshbunker (märsh′bung″kėr), n. Same as mossbunker.

marsh-buttercup (märsh′but″ėr-kup), n. A plant of the genus Villarsiella of the gentian family. [Australia.]

marsh-cinquefoil (märsh′singk″foil), n. Same as marsh-fivefinger.

marsh-cress (märsh′kres), n. A plant, Roripa palustris. Also called marsh-watercress.

marsh-diver (märsh′dī″vėr), n. Some marsh-bird, perhaps the bittern.

Marsh-divers, rather, maid, Shall croak thee sister. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

marsh-elder (märsh′el″dėr), n. 1. See *elder*2. —2. The wild guelder-rose, Viburnum Opulus.

marsh-fern (märsh′fėrn), n. One of the shield-ferns, Dryopteris Thelypteris.

marsh-fever (märsh′fē″vėr), n. Same as intermittent fever (which see, under *fever*1).

marsh-fish (märsh′fish), n. The mudfish, Amia calva.

marsh-fivefinger (märsh′fīv″fing-gėr), n. See fivefinger, 1, and Potentilla.

marsh-flower (märsh′flou″ėr), n. See Limnanthemum.

marsh-gas (märsh′gas), n. Light carbureted hydrogen. See fire-damp.

marsh-goose (märsh′gös), n. 1. The graylag. —2. Hutchins's goose, Bernicla hutchinsi. [North Carolina.]

marsh-grass (märsh′gràs), n. 1. Any grass that grows in marshes.— 2. Specifically, any grass of the genus Spartina, or cord-grass; also, Distichlis spicata. [U. S.]

marsh-harrier (märsh′har″i-ėr), n. A harrier of the genus Circus, especially C. æruginosus: so called from their fondness for hunting for frogs in marshy places. See *harrier*2, 2.

marsh-hawk (märsh′ hâk), n. The common American marsh-harrier, Circus hudsonius, the only member of the Circinæ found in North America: so called from frequenting marshes and wet meadows in search of its prey, which consists chiefly of frogs and other reptiles. The adult male is mostly bluish above and white below; the female and the young of both sexes are dark-brown above, with conspicuous white upper tail-coverts, and below of a light-reddish brown with darker markings. See cut under Circinæ.

marsh-hen (märsh′ hen), n. One of several different birds of the family Rallidæ. (a) The king-rail, Rallus elegans: more fully called fresh-water marsh-hen. (b) The clapper-rail, Rallus crepitans or longirostris: more fully called salt-water marsh-hen or salt-marsh hen. Also meadow-hen, mud-hen, sedge-hen. (c) The common American gallinule, Gallinula galeata. See cut under Gallinule. [Local, U. S.] (d) The American coot, Fulica americana. [New Eng.] (e) The European gallinule, Gallinula chloropus. Also moat-hen.

marshiness (mär′shi-nes), n. The state of being marshy.

marshland (märsh′ land), n. [< ME. mershland*, < AS. merscland, < mersc, marsh, + land, land.] A marshy district; marsh. Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 301.

marshly† (märsh′li), a. [< ME. mersschly; < marsh + *-ly*1.] Marshy.

Marsh-mallow (Althæa officinalis). a, involucre and calyx. b, the fruit.

A mersschly lond called Holdernesse.
Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 2. (Harl. MS.)

marsh-mallow (märsh′mal″ō), n. [< ME. mershmalwe*, < AS. merscmealwe (-mealewe, -mealuwe), < mersc, marsh, + mealwe, mallow.] 1. A shrubby herb, Althæa officinalis, growing in marshy places, especially maritime, in the temperate regions of the Old World, and on the coast of New England and New York. The flowering stalks are two or three feet high, the leaves broadly ovate, the moderate-sized flowers pale rose-color, chiefly in a terminal spike, but some peduncled in the upper axils. The mucilaginous root is used as a demulcent; it also forms the basis of well-known confections. The name has been locally applied to other plants, as Malva sylvestris. See Althæa and althein, and cut in preceding column.
2. A paste or confection made from the root of this plant. [In this sense usually written marshmallow.]

marsh-marigold (märsh′mar″i-gōld), n. A golden-flowered plant, Caltha palustris: in the United States also called cowslip. See Caltha and gowan.

The wild marsh-marigold shines like fire in swamps and hollows gray. Tennyson, May Queen.

marsh-miasma (märsh′mī-az″mä), n. Miasma from marshes or boggy spots; the infectious vapors which arise from certain marshes and marshy soils, and produce intermittent and remittent fevers.

marsh-nut (märsh′nut), n. Same as marking-nut.

marsh-parsley (märsh′pärs″li), n. 1. A plant, Apium graveolens, varieties of which form the cultivated celery.—2. A European umbelliferous plant, Peucedanum (Selinum) palustre. Its root has been used as an antispasmodic.

marsh-peep (märsh′pēp), n. The least stint or Wilson's sandpiper, Tringa (Actodromas) minutilla, the smallest and one of the most abundant of its tribe in North America.

marsh-pennywort (märsh′pen″i-wėrt), n. A creeping umbelliferous plant of Europe, Hydrocotyle vulgaris. It is also called white-rot. See flukewort.

marsh-pestle (märsh′pes″l), n. Same as marsh-beetle.

marsh-plover (märsh′pluv″ėr), n. The pectoral sandpiper, Actodromas maculata: a gunners' misnomer. [Plymouth Bay, Massachusetts.]

marsh-pullet (märsh′půl″et), n. The common American gallinule, Gallinula galeata. See cut under gallinule. [Washington, D. C.]

marsh-quail (märsh′kwāl), n. The meadow-lark, Sturnella magna. [Local, New Eng.]

marsh-ringlet (märsh′ring″let), n. A kind of butterfly, Cœnonympha davus.

marsh-robin (märsh′rob″in), n. The chewink or towhee-bunting, Pipilo erythrophthalmus: so called from its haunts, and the reddish color on the sides of the breast. [Local, U. S.]

marsh-rosemary (märsh′rōz″mā-ri), n. 1. A plant, Limonium Limonium, the root of which is a strong astringent, and is sometimes used in medicine. [U. S.]—2. An occasional name of the wild rosemary. See Ledum.

marsh-samphire (märsh′sam″fīr), n. A leafless, much-branched, jointed, succulent plant, Salicornia Europæa, found on muddy or moist sandy shores in both hemispheres. It is eaten by cattle, and makes a good pickle. See glasswort and Salicornia.

marsh-shrew (märsh′ shrö), n. An aquatic shrew of North America, Neosorex palustris, and other species of the same genus. The technical characters are similar to those of the water-shrew of Europe, Crossopus fodiens. They inhabit the northern United States and British America, ranging further south in alpine regions. See Neosorex.

marsh-snipe (märsh′ snīp), n. The common American snipe; the meadow-snipe. [Maryland, U. S.]

marsh-tackey (märsh′tak″i), n. A small horse peculiar to the coast-line of the southern United States; a swamp-pony. Sportsman's Gazetteer.

marsh-tea (märsh′tē), n. See Ledum.

marsh-tern (märsh′tėrn), n. The gull-billed tern or sea-swallow, Gelochelidon nilotica or anglica, of Europe, Asia, and America. See cut under Gelochelidon.

marsh-tit (märsh′tit), n. A European titmouse, Parus palustris, closely resembling the coal-tit.

marsh-trefoil (märsh′trē″foil), n. See Menyanthes.

marsh-watercress (märsh′ wâ″tėr-kres), n. Same as marsh-cress.

marshwort (märsh′wėrt), n. 1. The cranberry, Oxycoccus Oxycoccus.— 2. The umbelliferous plant Apium nodiflorum. [Eng.]

marsh-wren (märsh′ren), n. One of several different wrens which breed exclusively in marshes. Two are common in the United States, of which the best-known is the long-billed marsh-wren, Cistothorus palustris, found in suitable localities throughout most of North America. It is scarcely 5 inches long, above brown with a dorsal patch of black streaked with white, below white shaded on the sides, flanks, and crissum, the tail with fine blackish bars on a brown ground. This little bird is noted for its great globular nests with a hole in the side, affixed to the reeds and other rank herb-age of the marshes it colonizes. It lays from 6 to 10 eggs of chocolate-brown color, but many of the nests never have eggs in them, being apparently built and used by the males alone. A variety of this species found in California is known as the tulé wren. The short-billed marsh-wren, C. stellaris, is quite different, being almost entirely streaked above with black and white, besides the distinction implied in the name. It nests differently, lays white eggs, is less abundant, and is chiefly observed in the United States east of the Mississippi. Other kinds of marsh-wrens, mostly like the short-billed, inhabit Mexico, Central and South America, and the West Indies, but none of this genus are found in the Old World.

marshy (mär′shi), a. [< ME. mershy, merschy; < marsh + *-y*1.] 1. Partaking of the nature of a marsh; swampy; fenny.

No natural cause she found, from brooks or bogs
Or marshy lowlands, to produce the fogs.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i.

2. Produced in or peculiar to marshes.

Feed
With delicates of leaves and marshy weed.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iii. 277. (Latham.)

In snipes the colours are modified so as to be equally in harmony with the prevalent forms and colours of marshy vegetation. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 53.

Marsian (mär′si-an), a. [< Marsi (see Marsic) + -an.] Same as Marsic.

The ruins of the old Marsian city of Alba.
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 21.

Marsic (mär′sik), a. [< L. Marsicus, < Marsi (see def.).] Of or pertaining to the Marsi, a Sabine people of ancient Italy, living in the Apennines around Lake Fucinus: as, the Marsic or Social War (a contest against Rome, 90–88 B. C., of confederated tribes under the lead of the Marsi).

Marsilea (mär-sil′ē-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), named after L. F. Marsili, an early Italian naturalist.] A genus of aquatic or subaquatic a, the sporocarp or conceptacle; b, a sporocarp with valves opened and emitting the mucilaginous cord, which bears the sori.

pteridophytic plants, typical of the family Marsileaceæ. They have wide-creeping rootstocks, and leaves produced singly or in tufts from nodes of the rootstock, each consisting of a petiole and four sessile, equally spreading, deltoid-cuneate or oblanceolate leaflets with flabellate anastomosing veins. The conceptacles or sporocarps are ovoid or bean-shaped and two-valved, and emit a mucilaginous cord upon which are borne numerous oblong-cylindrical sori, each sorus containing numerous microsporangia and few macrosporangia. The genus is widely distributed, and embraces more than 50 species, of which 5 occur in the United States. M. Drummondii is the Australian nardoo. Sometimes written Marsilia.

Marsileaceæ (mär-sil-ē-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Marsilea + -aceæ.] A family of leptosporangiate heterosporous fern-like plants, in which the fructification consists of sporocarps either borne on peduncles which rise from the rootstock near the leaf-stalk or consolidated with it, and contains both macrospores and microspores.

Marsilieæ (mär-si-lī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Baker, 1887), < Marsilea + -ieæ.] With some systematists, a suborder of plants of the order Rhizocarpeæ or heterosporous Filicales: virtually the same as the family Marsileaceæ.

Marsilly carriage. A naval gun-carriage, in use with smooth-bore guns, having no front trucks, the front transom resting directly on the deck of the ship.

marsipobranch (mär′si-pō-brangk), a. and n. [See Marsipobranchii.] I. a. Having pursed gills; pertaining to the Marsipobranchii, or having their characters.

II. n. A vertebrate of the class Marsipobranchii; a myzont or myxine fish.

Marsipobranchiata (mär″si-pō-brang-ki-ā′tä), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Marsipobranchii.

marsipobranchiate (mär″si-pō-brang′ki-āt), a. and n. [As Marsipobranchii + -ate[1].] Same as marsipobranch.

Marsipobranchii (mär″si-pō-brang′ki-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μάρσιπος or μάρσυπος, a pouch, bag (see marsupium), + βράγχια, gills.] A group of vertebrates, variously denominated by naturalists. In all systems of classification it consists of those Vertebrata which have the skull imperfectly developed, the notochord not continued beyond the pituitary body, the brain distinctly differentiated, the heart well developed, with an auricle and a ventricle, the gills forming fixed sacs within branchial apertures on each side, six or more in number, jaws not present, and the mouth round like a sucker, whence the alternative name Cyclostomi. In the earlier systems the Marsipobranchii were regarded as an order or a subclass of fishes; they are now designated as a class of Vertebrata, and divided into two primary groups, Hyperoartia and Hyperotreta, the former comprising the lampreys, the latter the hags. Both are known as myzonts. Marsipobranchii is a synonym of Cyclostomi and Cyclostomata, 2. See cut under lamprey.

Skeleton of Head and Pouch-like Gills of Lamprey (Petromyzon), a marsipobranch.
au, auditory capsule; b, cartilaginous branchial "basket," depending from vertebral column, with seven complete descending branchial arches united by transverse bands between which are the gill-openings, and covering the heart at the part where the letter b is placed; e, ethmovomerine cartilage; h, rudiment of hyoid; n, neural arches of vertebræ; p p, palatoquadrate (or pterygopalatine) arch, the hinder pier of which represents a suspensorium, though there is no lower jaw.

marsoon (mär-sön′), n. [Corruption of F. marsouin, OF. marsouin, < OHG. meriswīn, MHG. merswīn, G. meerschwein = MLG. merswīn = Sw. Dan. marsvin, lit. 'sea-hog': see mereswine.] The white whale, Delphinapterus or Beluga leucas. See cut under Delphinapterus. [Local, Canada.]

marsupia, n. Plural of marsupium.

marsupial (mär-sū′pi-al), a. and n. [< NL. marsupialis, < L. marsupium, a pouch: see marsupium.] I. a. 1. Having the character of a bag, pouch, or marsupium; marsupiate. —2. Of or pertaining to a marsupium: as, marsupial bones. —3. Provided with a marsupium; specifically, pertaining to the Marsupialia, or having their characters. —Marsupial bones, epipubic bones, scleroskeletal ossifications developed in the tendon of the external oblique muscle of the abdomen of implacental mammals, and articulated with the pubic bones: supposed by some to be related to the support of the pouch, and known to have an office in relation to the muscle which acts upon the mammary glands. —Marsupial capsule. See capsule. —Marsupial frog. See frog[1].

Pelvis of Echidna, front view, showing m, marsupial bones; il, ilium; p, pubis; s, sacrum.

II. n. A member of the order Marsupialia, any implacental didelphian mammal. Also called marsupiate. —Herbivorous marsupials. See herbivorous.

Pelvis of a Kangaroo, showing M, marsupial bones, borne upon P, pubis; Il, ilium; Is, ischium; O, obturator foramen; A, acetabulum; S, sacrum; V, several lumbar vertebræ.

Marsupialia (mär-sū-pi-ā′li-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of marsupialis: see marsupial.] An order of the class Mammalia, coextensive with the subclass Didelphia, containing implacental mammals usually provided with a marsupium or pouch for the reception and nourishment of the young; the marsupials or pouched animals. There being no developed placenta, the period of gestation is very brief, and the young are born extremely small, imperfect, and quite helpless. In this state they are immediately transferred to the pouch on the belly of the mother, where are the teats, to which the little creatures adhere firmly for a while, completing their development by sucking milk. As they grow larger and stronger, they are able to let go and take hold of the teat again; and even after leaving the pouch they may for a while retreat to it, or be carried about elsewhere on the mother's body. (See cut under marmose.) The uterus is double, and the vagina also is more or less completely divided into two separate passages (whence the name Didelphia); the scrotum of the male is abdominal in position, and pendulous, in front of the penis. The corpus callosum is rudimentary, but the cerebral hemispheres are connected by a well-developed anterior commissure. The angle of the mandible is normally inflected. There is a wide range of adaptive modification in the structural details of the marsupials, the order in itself including representatives or analogues of nearly all the other orders of mammals, as the carnivorous, the insectivorous, the herbivorous, etc. At the present time the marsupials are eminently characteristic of the Australian region, only the Didelphyidæ or opossums being found in America; but in former epochs the distribution of the marsupials was general, and some of the oldest known mammalian fossils of Mesozoic age are supposed to belong to this order. It has been variously subdivided. Owen in 1839 divided it into five tribes, Sarcophaga, Entomophaga, Carpophaga, Poëphaga, and Rhizophaga. A main division, based on the dentition, is into Diprotodontia and Polyprotodontia. In 1872 Gill made the four suborders Rhizophaga, Syndactyli, Dasyuromorpha, and Didelphimorpha, with nine families, Phascolomyidæ, Macropodidæ, Tarsipedidæ, Phalangistidæ, Phascolarctidæ, Peramelidæ, Dasyuridæ, Myrmecobiidæ, and Didelphyidæ, for the living forms, and four fossil families, Diprotodontidæ, Thylacoleontidæ, Plagiaulacidæ, and Dromatheriidæ. Also called Marsupiata.

marsupialian (mär-sū-pi-ā′li-an), a. and n. [< marsupial + -ian.] Same as marsupial.

marsupian (mär-sū′pi-an), a. and n. Same as marsupial.

Marsupiata (mär-sū-pi-ā′tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of marsupiatus, pouched: see marsupiate.] Same as Marsupialia.

marsupiate (mär-sū′pi-āt), a. and n. [< NL. marsupiatus, pouched, < L. marsupium, a pouch: see marsupium.] Same as marsupial.

marsupiated (mär-sū′pi-ā-ted), a. [< marsupiate + -ed[2].] Same as marsupial.

marsupium (mär-sū′pi-um), n.; pl. marsupia (-ä). [L., also marsuppium, < Gr. μαρσίπιον, also written μαρσίππιον, μαρσίνπιον, μαρσίπειον, dim. of μάρσιπος, μαρσίππος, μάρσυπος, a pouch, bag.] 1. In Rom. antiq., a purse of the kind usually borne in the hand of Mercury, and indicating his character as god of gain. —2. In med., a sack or bag in which any part of the body is fomented. —3. In zoöl., a purse- or pouch-like receptacle for the eggs or young, more external than any of the proper organs of gestation; a brood-pouch of any kind. (a) In mammal., the duplication of the skin of the abdomen of Marsupialia, forming a pouch in which the mammary glands open, and into which the imperfectly developed young are transferred at birth, to be nourished until they are able to move about. (b) In ornith.: (1) A temporary fold of the skin of the belly of a penguin, in which the egg may be contained for a time. (2) The pecten or bourse, a vascular erectile organ in the eye of a bird, formed of pectinated folds of the choroid coat lying in the vitreous humor, and extending a variable distance toward or to the crystalline lens: supposed by some to effect or assist in the accommodation of the eye. (c) In ichth.: (1) A receptacle in which the pipe-fishes and sea-horses carry their young: it is developed in the male. (2) The pouch-like arrangement of the gills of a marsipobranchiate fish, as a hag or lamprey. (d) In Crustacea, a receptacle for the eggs, formed by the bases of some of the legs of certain crustaceans, as the opossum-shrimps or Mysidæ.

4. In anat., the alar ligaments (which see, under alar).

mart[1] (märt), n. [Contr. of market, prob. due to the D. form markt: see market.] 1. A place of sale or traffic; seat of trade; market.

> If any born at Ephesus be seen
> At any Syracusian marts and fairs,
> . . . he dies. Shak., C. of E., i. 1. 18.

> Certaine it is, Rome thereby becomes a rich Mart, where the marchants of the Earth resort from all places of the Earth to buy heauen. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 127.

2†. Trade; traffic; purchase and sale; market.

> Christ could not suffer that the temple should serve for a place of mart. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 12.

> Which on his helmet martelled so hard,
> That made him low incline his lofty crest.
> Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 42.

martel-de-fer (mär′tel-dē-fer), n. A weapon used in Europe during the middle ages, especially during the fifteenth century. (a) A long-handled weapon used by foot-soldiers, especially in the defense of fortified walls and in action against mounted men-at-arms. The plommé was a common form of it. (b) A short-handled weapon, used with only one hand by mounted men. It was common to furnish it with one blunt or dentated face and with a sharp point or beak on the opposite side of the handle, but in some cases both sides were pointed. The short-handled hammers were frequently made of metal throughout. Also called horseman's hammer.

Martels-de-fer.
1. Horseman's hammer of about the time of Edward IV. 2. Martel-de-fer, time of Henry VIII. 3. Martel-de-fer, time of Edward VI. 4. Martel-de-fer with hand-gun, time of Queen Elizabeth.

marteline (mär′te-lin), n. [F., dim. of martel: see martel, n.] A small hammer or mallet used by sculptors and marble-workers. It is pointed at one end and square or diamond-shaped at the other. E. H. Knight.

marteline-chisel (mär′te-lin-chiz″el), n. A form of sculptors' chisel with a serrated edge.

martellato (mär-tel-lä′tō). [It., pp. of martellare, strike: see martel, v.] In music, struck with a sudden, emphatic blow: used of the tones of a melody or of successive chords that are intended to be markedly distinct and more or less staccato, especially in violin- and pianoforte-playing.

martellement (F. pron. mär-tel′moṅ), adv. [F., < It. martellamente, < martellare, strike, hammer: see martel, v.] In music for the harp, with an acciaccatura or with a redoubled stroke.

martello tower. See tower.

marten[1] (mär′ten), n. [Formerly also martin; early mod. E. martern, martrone (prop. the fur of the marten, orig. adj.: see marterin), for earlier marter, martre, < F. martre, marte = Pr. mart = Sp. Pg. marta = It. martora, < ML. martus, marturis, mardarus, mardalus, mardarius, L. martes (found but once, in a doubtful reading), of Teut. origin: OHG. marder, MHG. marder, mader, G. marder, OS. marthar* (in marthrīn, adj.) (D. marter), AS. mearth = Icel. mörðr = Sw. mård = Dan. maar, a marten; no Goth. form recorded.] 1. A digitigrade carnivorous quadruped of the family Mustelidæ, subfamily Mustelinæ, and genus Mustela or Martes, of which there are several species, all inhabiting the northern hemisphere. The name was originally given to the common pine-marten, Mustela martes or Martes abietum, of the northerly parts of Europe. This animal is about 18 inches long, with a full bushy tail 12 inches long, and thus rather larger than a house-cat, but standing much lower, on account of the shortness of the legs. The fur, consisting of three kinds of hairs, is full and soft, and of an extremely variable shade of brown, usually paler on the head and under parts. A closely related species is the stone- or beech-marten, Mustela foina, of Great Britain and many other parts of Europe; it is, on the average, smaller in size, with a whitish throat and inferior pelage. The American pine-marten, M. americana, is similar, but specifically distinct; it inhabits the north-American Sable or Pine-marten (Mustela americana).

erly United States and the whole of British America, and is commonly called the American sable. The Siberian or true sable is M. zibellina, of blackish color and with an extremely rich and valuable fur. The pekan, fisher, or Pennant's marten, Mustela pennanti, much larger than any of the foregoing and of a blackish color, is a very distinct species peculiar to northerly North America. See sable, and cut under fisher, 2.

Those that, in Norway and in Finland, chase
The soft-skind Martens, for their precious cace.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 4.

2. A carnivorous marsupial of the genus Phascogale, as the spotted marten of Australia. [Australia.]

marten[2]†, n. An obsolete spelling of martin[2].

marter†, n. An obsolete form of marten[1].

marternt, martrint, n. [Early mod. E. also martron; < ME. martrin, also marteron, martern, martron, < OF. marterine, martrine, the fur of the marten, fem. of marterin, martrin, of the marten, < martre, the marten: see marten[1].] 1. The fur of the marten.

Ne martryn, ne sabil, y trowe, in god fay,
Was none founder in hire garnement.
Lydgate. (Halliwell, under martern.)

2. A marten.

The Lyserne, the Beauer, the Sable, the Martron, the black and dunne fox. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 479.

Martes (mär'tēz), n. [NL., < L. martes, a marten: see marten[1].] The specific name of the common pine-marten, used as a generic designation of the martens: same as Mustela. Cuvier, 1797.

martext (mär'tekst), n. [< mar[1], v., + obj. text.] A perverter of texts; a blundering or ignorant preacher: used as a proper name by Shakspere.

I have been with Sir Oliver Martext, the vicar of the next village. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 3. 43.

marthy (mär'thi), n. The burbot. [Hudson's Bay.]

martial (mär'shal), a. and n. [= F. martial = Sp. Pg. marcial = It. marziale, < L. martialis, of or pertaining to Mars, or war, < Mars, the god of war: see Mars.] I. a. 1. [cap.] Pertaining to or characteristic of the god Mars.

This is his hand;
His foot Mercurial, his Martial thigh.
Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2. 310.

2. Of or pertaining to war; of warlike character; military; warlike; soldierly: as, a martial equipage or appearance; martial music; a martial nation.

And shew'd to them such martiale sport
With his long bow and arrow,
That they of him did give report.
True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 360).

How farest thou, mirror of all martial men?
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 4. 74.

With glittering firelocks on the village green
In proud array a martial band is seen.
O. W. Holmes, A Family Record.

3. Having reference to a state of war, or to a military organization; connected with the army and navy: opposed to civil: as, martial law; a court martial.

They proceeded in a kind of martial justice.
Bacon, Holy War.

The Laws themselves, civil as well as martial, were published and executed in Latin. Howell, Letters, ii. 58.

Now martial law commands us to forbear.
Pope, Iliad, vii. 352.

4. [cap.] Pertaining to or resembling the planet Mars.

The natures of the fixed stars are . . . esteemed martial or jovial according to the colors whereby they answer these planets. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 14.

We can actually see his [Mars's] polar snows accumulate during the Martial winter and melt away at the approach of the Martial summer. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 382.

5†. In old chem., having the properties of iron.

Why should the Chalybes or Bilboa boast
Their harden'd iron, when our mines produce
As perfect martial ore? J. Philips, Cider, i.

Æthiops martial†. See æthiops.—Martial law, law imposed by the military power; that military rule or authority which exists in time of war, and is conferred by the laws of war, in relation to persons and things under and within the scope of active military operations, and which extinguishes or suspends, for the time being, civil rights and the remedies founded upon them, so far as this may be necessary in order to the full accomplishment of the purpose of the war. The person who exercises martial law is, however, liable in an action for any abuse of the authority thus conferred. It is the application of military government—the government of force—to persons and property within its scope, according to the laws and usages of war, to the exclusion of municipal government in all respects where the latter would impair the efficiency of military law or military action. Benét. See military law, under military.—Martial music, music for military purposes, or of a similar kind; music characterized by spirit, impetuosity, heavy duple rhythm, sonority, and brilliance.—Martial salts†, an old name of salts of iron.—Syn. 2 and 3. Martial, Warlike, Military. The opposite of martial is civil, of warlike is peaceful, of military is civil or naval. Warlike applies most to the spirit or ingrained habits, as the warlike tribes of the north, but it also applies to that which is like war or naturally goes with war: as, warlike preparations; warlike rumors. Martial applies to that which is connected with war in a general way, or with war as active, and especially as appealing to the eye or the ear: as, martial music, din, pomp, appearance, array. Military applies more closely to things connected with the actual putting of soldiers into service: thus, a court martial is composed of military officers, and may therefore be called a military court; it applies martial law; its members appear in full military dress.

II.† n. A soldier, or military man.

The Queen of martials
And Mars himself conducted them.
Chapman, Iliad, xviii. 469.

Others strive Like sturdy Martials far away to drive
The drowsy Droanes that harbour in the hive.
Fuller, David's Sinne, st. 36. (Davies.)

martialism (mär'shal-izm), n. [< martial + -ism.] The character of being martial; warlike spirit or propensity; military character.

Such a young Alexander for affecting martialism and chivalrie; such a young Josiah for religion and piety.
Creation of the Prince of Wales, D. 2, 1610. (Latham.)

He [Skobeleff] had got about him a rugged, motley crowd of stanch fighting men, of whose martialism he had had experience in his Asiatic warfare.
Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 29.

martialist (mär'shal-ist), n. [= It. martialista (Florio); as martial + -ist.] A warrior or soldier; a military man.

The exquisite portraiture of a perfect martialist, consisting in three principall pointes: wisedome to governe, fortitude to perfourme, liberalitie to incourage.
Greene, Euphues to Philantus (1587).

5. In gram., belonging to or having the characteristics of that one of the so-called genders into which the nouns, etc., of some languages are divided which includes as its prominent part the names of male beings; having inflections or forms belonging to such words: as, a masculine noun; a masculine termination. See gender. By statute in England and many of the United States, words of the masculine gender used in the general statutes include females unless the contrary intent appear. Abbreviated m. and masc.

6. In bot., relating to stamens: same as male[1], 2. —Masculine cesura. See cesura.—Masculine numbers, odd numbers.—Masculine rimes. Same as male rimes (which see, under male[1], a.).—Masculine signs, in astrol., the first, third, fifth, etc., signs of the zodiac.=Syn. Male, Masculine, Mannish, Manly, Manful, Virile, Gentlemanly. (See comparison under feminine.) Male, matching female, applies to the whole sex among human beings and gender among animals, to the apparel of that sex, and, by figure, to certain things, as plants, rimes, cesuras, screws, joints. Masculine, matching feminine, applies to men and their attributes and to the first grammatical gender: a woman may wear male apparel and have a masculine walk, voice, manner, temperament. Mannish, not closely matching womanish, applies to that which is somewhat like man, as when a boy gets a mannish voice, and to that in woman which is too much like man to be womanly. (See quotations under mannish.) Manly, matching womanly, is the word into which have been gathered the highest conceptions of what is noble in man or worthy of his manhood, especially as opposed to that which is fawning or underhand. Manful expresses the stanchness, fearlessness, and energy of a man, as opposed to that which is weak, cowardly, or supine. Virile has lost much of its suggestion of the qualities of a man; it is generally used in expression of the notion of energy or strength. Gentlemanly has a cheaper sense, expressing the practice of the merely external courtesies, but it is also a high word for the possession of a manly refinement both of nature and of manners.

II. n. (a) In gram., the masculine gender; (b) a word of this gender.

ML. mascus, masca, mascha, mask, specter, masca, witch, Pr. masco, witch. The supposed connection with Sp. máscara, It. maschera, mask, masker, is unproved.] 1. A cover for the face with apertures for seeing and breathing; especially, such a cover, usually of silk or velvet, as worn at masquerades; a false face; a vizor. Ancient Greek and Roman actors wore masks covering the head as well as the face, made to simulate the characters represented, with hair and beard when required, and with mouth-pieces so formed as to swell the volume of the voice; and masks of various forms have continued to be used in mummeries and pantomimes: for the latter (as also at masked balls), commonly covering only the upper part of the face to the tip of the nose or the upper lip. Masks are often used for disguise, as during the commission of nefarious acts, and, under the name of false faces, usually grotesque or hideous, as toys for children; also sometimes by women to preserve the complexion, or as vehicles for the application of cosmetics. Masks of wire, gauze, etc., are used to afford protection to the face, as from splinters, dust, or smoke in glass-works, grinding-mills, and other factories, and also by fencers, firemen, and base-ball catchers.

Mask.

2. A festive entertainment or performance in which the participants are masked or wear a disguising costume; a body of maskers; a masquerade; a revel.

Pan. A masque! what's that?
Scri. A mumming or a shew,
With vizards and fine clothes.
Clench. A disguise, neighbour,
Is the true word.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, v. 2.

This thought might lead me through the world's vain mask Content, though blind. Milton, Sonnets, xvii.

'Twould make a very pretty dancing Suit in a Mask.
Steele, Tender Husband, iii. 1.

3. A form of histrionic spectacle, much in vogue during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It probably originated in the practice of introducing on solemn or festive occasions men wearing masks to represent mythical or allegorical characters. From a mere acted pageant, it gradually developed into a complete dramatic entertainment, in which the scenes were accompanied and embellished by music, and, in the hands of writers like Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Milton, reached a high degree of literary excellence.

The king is gone this day for Royston, and hath left with the queen a commandment to meditate upon a mask for Christmas, so that they grow serious about that already.
Donne, Letters, xxxvi.

I, who till now Spectator was, must in The glorious Masque an Actor be.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 110.

The musical dramas known under the name of masques, which were so popular from the time of Ben Jonson to the time of the Rebellion, kept up a general taste for the art.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iv.

4. Anything used or practised for disguise or concealment; anything interposed as a safeguard against observation, discovery, or disclosure; a screen or disguise; a subterfuge, pretext, or shift: as, a mask of brush in front of a battery; suffering under a mask of gaiety.

The Phylosophers of Greece durst not a long time appeare to the worlde but vnder the masks of Poets.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

Meanwhile the face
Conceals the mood lethargic with a mask
Of deep deliberation. Cowper, Task, iv. 299.

5. A person wearing a mask.

A Mask, who came behind him [Sir Roger], gave him a gentle tap upon the shoulder, and asked him if he would drink a bottle of mead with her.
Addison, Spectator, No. 383.

The fair sat panting at a courtier's play,
And not a mask went unimproved away.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 541.

6. In sculp.: (a) A representation in any material, as marble, metal, terra-cotta, or wax, of the face only of a figure, or of the face with the front of the neck and upper part of the chest: as, a mask of Jupiter; comic and tragic masks. (b) An impression or cast of the face of a person, living or dead, made by covering the face with some plastic or semi-fluid substance, as plaster of Paris, which is removed when it has become sufficiently set.—7. In arch., a representation of a face, generally grotesque, employed to fill and adorn vacant places, as in corbels, friezes, panels of doors, keys of arches, etc.—8. In surg., a linen bandage with apertures for the eyes, nose, and mouth, applied over the face in cases of burns, scalds, erysipelas, etc.—9. In zoöl.: (a) A formation or coloration of the head like a mask; a hood or capistrum. See masked. (b) Specifically, in entom., the greatly enlarged labium or lower lip of the larval and pupal dragon-fly. It is elongate, spatulate, and armed at the end with two hooks adapted for seizing prey; but in repose the whole organ is folded up over the lower part of the face, concealing the jaws and other mouth-organs beneath. Hence, though these larvæ are exceedingly voracious, they appear at first sight quite harmless. Also called forcipate labium.—Iron mask. See the man in the iron mask, below.—Mask of steel, a name given to an unusual piece of armor of the thirteenth century, consisting of a shaped and pierced plate of steel applied to the camail or coif of mail in such a way as to protect the face, which the camail leaves exposed.—Mask-wall, in fort., the scarp-wall of a casemate.—The man in the iron mask, a prisoner of state in France, masked in a vizor of black velvet, who was confined and guarded in the fortresses of Sainte Marguerite, the Bastille, and elsewhere, in the reign of Louis XIV. The prisoner's identity is not certainly known. He was supposed to have been a prince of the house of Bourbon.

Mask of Steel, 13th century.

mask[3] (másk), v. [Formerly also masque, maske; < F. masquer, mask; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To cover the face of, wholly or in part, for concealment, disguise, or defense; conceal with a mask or vizor.

They must all be mask'd and vizarded.
Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 6. 40.

2. To cover with a disguising costume of any kind, as in a masquerade.

They are not presented as themselves,
But masqued like others.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

3. To disguise; conceal; screen from view by something interposed.

Masking the business from the common eye.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1. 125.

Now a poore man has not vizard enough to maske his vices, nor ornament enough to set forth his vertues.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Poore Man.

Who [men] never shew their Passions more violently and unreasonably than when they are mask'd under a Pretence of Zeal against Heresie and Innovation.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. iii.

masoola-boat, masulah-boat (ma-sō'lä-bōt'), n. A large East Indian boat used on the Coromandel coast for conveying passengers and goods between ships and the shore. It stands high out of the water, thus presenting a great surface to the wind, is difficult to manage, and slow; but it is well adapted for the purpose for which it is used, and sustains on the bars and shores shocks that would break up any European boat, the planks of which it is built being fastened together by cocoanut fibers. It is rowed sometimes with as many as sixteen oars. As the boat approaches the shore, the boatmen watch the opportunity of a coming wave to drive it high on the beach, where it is quickly run up out of the reach of the next rolling wave. Also called chelingue. Imp. Dict.

Masora, Massorah (mas'ọ̄-rä), n. [Heb., tradition.] 1. The tradition by which Jewish scholars endeavored to fix the correct text of the Old Testament, so as to preserve it from all corruption.—2. After the ninth century, the book, or the marginal notes to the Hebrew text, in which the results of such tradition are preserved, embodying the labor of several centuries. There is a twofold Masora, a Babylonian or Eastern, and a Palestinian or Western, the former being the more important. The Masora not only takes account of various readings, but also contains notes of a grammatical and lexicographical character, including the system of Hebrew vowel-points first established by it. With much that is valueless, it contains all the material from which a critical revision of the Old Testament text can now be derived. Also written Masorah and Massora.

A more accurate and lasting masoreth than either the synagogue of Ezra or the Galilæan school at Tiberias hath left us. Milton, Divorce, To the Parliament.

Masorete, n. Same as Masorite.

masoretic, massoretic (mas-ọ̄-ret'ik), a. [< Masorete + -ic.] Relating or belonging to the Masora, or to the compilers of the Masora; pertaining to the method or system of the Masora: as, masoretic points—that is, the vowel-points furnished by the Masora.

The text which the Revisers used was the so-called massoretic or traditional text. Bibliotheca Sacra, XLIII. 559.

masoretical, massoretical (mas-ọ̄-ret'i-ka̤l), a. [< masoretic + -al.] Same as masoretic.

Masorite, Massorite (mas'ọ̄-rīt), n. [< Masora + -ite[2].] One who made the Jewish traditional interpretation of the Bible his special study; specifically, one of that body of Jewish scholars which first put the Masora into written form. See Masora. Also Masorete, Masoret, Massorete, Massoret.

The Masorites extended their care to the vowels. Mather, Vindication of the Bible, p. 257. (Latham.)

The name missa is usually said to be taken from the words ite, missa est, 'go, it is the dismissal,' or 'go, dismissed' (the word concio, 'congregation,' being unnecessarily supposed to be omitted), thought to have been used at that point of the mass when the catechumens were dismissed, and the communion service followed; but it appears to have referred orig. to the dismissal of the congregation at the end of the mass, and to have been applied, by an easy transfer, to the service itself.] 1. The celebration of the Lord's Supper or eucharist.

That Office which was called the Mass by the mediæval and the Latin Church, but which we now call the Lord's Supper and the Holy Communion. Procter, Hist. Book of Com. Prayer, p. 305.

The Supper of the Lord, and the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass. Book of Common Prayer (1549).

2. The office for the celebration of the eucharist; the liturgy. The component parts of the mass or liturgy are the ordinary of the mass (ordo missæ) and the canon of the mass (canon missæ), succeeded by the communion (sometimes counted part of the canon) and postcommunion. Anciently and technically the part preceding the offertory is the mass or liturgy of the catechumens (missa catechumenorum), the remainder the mass or liturgy of the faithful (missa fidelium). In the Roman Catholic Church different classes of masses are high mass, low mass, private mass, votive mass, etc. See the phrases below.

It nedith not to speke of the meesse ne the seruise that thei hadde that day, for it were but losse of tyme. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 375.

And whan our parish-masse was done,
Our kinge was bowne to dyne.
Sir Cauline (Child's Ballads, III. 175).

The time of the Communion shall be immediately after that the Priest himself hath received the Sacrament, without the varying of any other rite or ceremony in the Mass. Order of the Communion (1548).

The maiden buried, not as one unknown,
Nor meanly, but with gorgeous obsequies,
And mass, and rolling music, like a queen.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

3. The sacrament of the eucharist or holy communion. The word mass in this and the preceding senses is popularly used of the eucharist as celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church, or of the teachings of that church with regard to the sacrament, as involving not only the doctrines of the real presence and the eucharistic sacrifice, held in some other churches also, but the doctrine of transubstantiation as defined by the Council of Trent. The use of the word mass (missa) in the Western Church is as old as the fourth century. The Greek Church has no term precisely corresponding to mass, the sacrament being generally called the eucharist or holy communion, and the office the liturgy. At the Reformation the first Prayer-Book (1549) of the Church of England retained the name mass, which was omitted in the second book (1552) and fell into disuse, being popularly regarded as involving a Roman Catholic view of the sacrament. The use of the word has, however, been revived to some extent among Anglicans in the present century. Swedish and Danish Protestants use the corresponding word for their own communion office.

4. A musical setting of certain parts of the Roman Catholic liturgy, also of corresponding parts of the Anglican liturgy. It consists usually of the following sections, each of which is sometimes divided into separate movements: Kyrie, Gloria (including the Gratias agimus, Qui tollis, Quoniam, Cum Sancto Spiritu), Credo (including the Et Incarnatus, Crucifixus, Et Resurrexit), Sanctus (including the Hosanna), Benedictus (including a repetition of the Hosanna), and the Agnus Dei (including the Dona nobis). To these an Offertorium (after the Credo and before the Sanctus) is sometimes added. The Requiem Mass differs largely from the regular mass, and includes settings of several of the stanzas of the hymn "Dies Iræ." The artistic form of musical masses varies widely, from unaccompanied plain-song to the most elaborate polyphony with orchestral accompaniments. Medieval masses were named usually from the melody which was taken as the subject for contrapuntal treatment, as Josquin's mass "L'homme armé"; modern masses are named from the key of the first movement, as Bach's "Mass in B minor."

5. A church festival or feast-day: now only in composition: as, Candlemas, Childermas, Christmas, Lammas, Martinmas, Marymas, Michaelmas, Roodmas (compare kermess).—By the mass†, an oath formerly in common use: sometimes abbreviated to mass.

Mrs. Page. Trust me, he beat him most pitifully.
Mrs. Ford. Nay, by the mass, that he did not; he beat him most unpitifully, methought. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 2. 214.

'Mass, here he comes.
Middleton (and others), The Widow, iii. 3.

Capitular mass, in collegiate churches, high mass, celebrated on Sundays or festivals.—Consummation of the mass. See consummation.—Conventual mass, a solemn mass celebrated daily in cathedral and collegiate churches, in memory of and for the benefit of their founders.—Dry mass, dry service, a form of service, not properly a mass, consisting of part of the eucharistic office, but without consecration, such as the naval or nautical mass, or the mass of the presanctified. The same name was also given to an office consisting of part of the ordinary of the mass, and without either consecration, elevation, or communion: said in some places in the middle ages for strangers who came too late for the celebration. The Typica of the Greek Church have been compared to such an office. What is commonly known as the Ante-communion Service has sometimes been called by Anglican writers the Dry Service (Missa sicca).—High mass, a mass accompanied by music and incense, celebrated on Sundays, feast-days, and other special occasions by a priest or prelate, attended by a deacon and subdeacon.—Low mass, the ordinary mass, said, not sung, by the priest.—Mass bell. See bell[1].—Mass for the dead, a mass celebrated for a person or persons after their death; in the Roman Catholic Church, one celebrated for the purpose of hastening the release of a soul or souls from purgatory. The color of the vestments, etc., is black.—Mass of the Holy Ghost, a solemn mass for the Pope, the sovereign, or the state, and for all in union with the church or with a religious order. It is celebrated previous to a council or to the election of a bishop or abbot, and also at consecrations and coronations, or to obtain from God some special light or favor.—Mass of the Presanctified. Same as Liturgy of the Presanctified. See liturgy.—Ordinary of the mass. See ordinary.—Private mass. (a) Low mass. (b) Any mass where only the priest communicates, especially such a mass celebrated in a private oratory.—Votive mass, a mass which does not correspond with the office of the day, but is said at the choice of the priest.

mass[1] (màs), v. i. [< mass[1], n.] To celebrate mass.

As for the rumours that have or do go abroad, either of our relenting or massing, we trust that they which know God and their duty towards their brethren in Christ will not be too light of credence. Bp. Ridley, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 83.

Massing priest†, a priest of the Roman Catholic Church.

Christ's doctrine is, that he is "the way": but this doctrine maketh the massing-priest the way. J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 293.

★ mass[2] (màs), n. [< ME. masse, < OF. masse, F. masse = Pr. massa = Sp. masa = Pg. It. massa = OHG. massa, MHG. G. masse = Dan. masse = Sw. massa, < L. massa, a lump, mass (as of dough, pitch, salt, cheese, metal, stone, etc.), prob. < Gr. μᾶζα, a barley cake; cf. μάγμα, a kneaded mass, < μάσσειν, knead: see macerate. Hence ult. maslin[1].] 1. A body of coherent matter; a lump, particularly a large or unformed lump: as, a mass of iron or lead; a mass of flesh; a mass of rock.

Right in the midst the Goddesse selfe did stand Upon an altar of some costly masse.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 39.

One common mass composed the mould of man.
Dryden, Sig. and Guis., l. 502.

Myro's Statues, which for Art surpass
All others, once were but a shapeless Mass.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

2. An assemblage or collection of incoherent particles or things; an agglomeration; a congeries; hence, amount or number in general: as, a mass of sand; a mass of foliage, of troops, etc.

I remember a mass of things, but nothing distinctly. Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 289.

In our study of anatomy there is a mass of mysterious philosophy. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 36.

3. The bulk or greater part of anything; the chief portion; the main body.

The great mass of the articles on which impost is paid is foreign luxuries. Jefferson, Works, VIII. 68.

The great mass of human calamities, in all ages, has been the result of bad government. Story, Misc. Writings, p. 618.

4. Bulk in general; magnitude; massiveness.

Witness this army of such mass and charge.
Shak., Hamlet, iv. 4. 47.

5. The quantity of any portion of matter as expressed in pounds or grams, and measured on an ordinary balance with the proper reduction for the buoyancy of the atmosphere; otherwise, the relative inertia, or power in reaction, of a body. For example, if two bodies at rest, but free to move, as a gun suspended in vacuo and a bullet in it, are suddenly separated by a force acting between them, their respective velocities will be inversely as their masses, and this phenomenon best defines mass. Sometimes confounded with weight, which is properly the force with which a body is accelerated in the direction in which a plummet points, in consequence of the earth's attraction and rotation. Thus, if a piece of lead which is found to weigh a pound at the base of the Washington monument is transported to the top, it will be found to weigh a pound there, for its mass is unchanged. But if only the piece of lead and the balance are carried to the top of the monument, while the weight against which it has been weighed is left at the base, and there attached to the balance at the top by means of a long string or wire (the weight of which is to be properly allowed for), the piece of lead would be found to have lost the weight of one third of a grain, the weight thus varying though the mass does not.

The destructive effects of a cannon-ball are due entirely to its mass and to the relative speed with which it impinges on the target, and would be exactly the same (for the same relative speed) in regions so far from the earth or other attracting body that the ball had practically no weight at all. . . . When we open a large iron gate properly hinged, it is the mass with which we have to deal; if it were lying on the ground and we tried to lift it, we should have to deal mainly with its weight. Tait, Properties of Matter.

6. In entom., the terminal joints collectively of an antenna when they are enlarged and closely appressed to each other, forming a clava or club. —7. A large bunch of strung beads (12 small bunches fastened together).—Blue mass. See blue-mass.—Buccal mass. See buccal.—Center of mass. See center[1].—Cleavage-mass. See cleavage.—Exploding mass, in cephalopods. See extract under spermatophore.—Flat masses. See blanket-deposit.—Levy in mass. See levy[1].—The masses, the great body of the people, especially of the working class and the lower orders; the populace.

mass[2] (màs), v. [< mass[2], n.] I. trans. 1. To form into a mass; collect into masses; assemble in one body or in close conjunction: as, to mass troops at a certain place; to mass the points of an argument.

> The fragmentary produce of much toil,
> In a dim heap, fact and surmise together
> Confusedly massed as when acquired.
> Browning, Paracelsus.

2†. To strengthen, as a building for the purpose of fortification.

> They feared the French might, with filling or massing the house, or else by fortifying, make such a piece as might annoy the haven. Hayward.

II. intrans. To collect in masses; assemble in groups or in force.

> The rebels massed in the north-west angle of the Memphis and Charleston and the Mobile and Ohio railroads.
> U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 416.

mass[3]† (màs), n. See mas[2].

> Mass constable, I have other manner of matter
> To bring you about than this.
> B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, ii. 1.

massa (mas′ä), n. A corruption of master[1]. [Negro dialect, U. S.]

Massachusettensian (mas-a-chö-se-ten′si-an), n. [< NL. Massachusettensis, < Massachusetts, a name of Amer. Ind. origin.] A native or an inhabitant of the State of Massachusetts. [Rare.]

> In this society of Massachusettensians, then, there is . . . a moral and political equality of rights and duties among all the individuals. J. Adams, Works, IV. 392.

massacre (mas′a-kėr), n. [< F. massacre (ML. mazacrium), massacre, killing, also the head of a stag newly killed; appar. of Teut. origin, and prob. < LG. matsken, matzgen, cut, hew, = D. matsen, maul, kill, = G. metzen, cut, kill, > metzelei, massacre: see mason.] 1. The indiscriminate killing of human beings; the unnecessary slaughter of a number of persons, as in barbarous warfare or persecution, or for revenge or plunder: as, the massacre of Glencoe: sometimes applied also to the wholesale killing of wild animals.

> Where stain'd nobility lies trodden on,
> And rebels' arms triumph in massacres.
> Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 4. 14.

2. In her., a pair of antlers or attires attached to a piece of the skull, used as a bearing.—Massacre of the innocents. See innocent, n.—Syn. Massacre, Butchery, Carnage. Massacre denotes the indiscriminate and general slaughter of many; butchery a ruthless, unsparing, and cruel slaughter, as though it were done at the shambles; carnage a great slaughter, suggesting the piled-up dead of the battle-field. See kill[1].

massacre (mas′a-kėr), v. t.; pret. and pp. massacred, ppr. massacring. [< massacre, n.] To kill with attendant circumstances of atrocity; butcher; slaughter: commonly used in reference to the killing of a large number of human beings at once, who are not in a condition to defend themselves.

> The cohort was massacred by the fraude of the Agrippinensis. Sir H. Savile, tr. of Tacitus, p. 180.
>
> Do the locks bristle and the eyebrows arch
> For grouse or partridge massacred in March?
> Scott, The Poacher.

=Syn. Murder, Slaughter, etc. See kill[1].

massacrer (mas′a-krėr), n. One who massacres. [Rare.]

> We have put wax into our ears to shut them up against the tender soothing strains of regicides, assassins, massacrers, and septembrisers. Burke, A Regicide Peace, i.

massacrous† (mas′a-krus), a. [< massacre + -ous.] Cruelly murderous.

> Theyr mindes benummed with the massacrous monstrousness of thys quick marshall-law.
> Nash, Christ's Teares over Jerusalem.

massage[1]†, n. An obsolete form of message.

massage[2] (ma-säzh′), n. [< F. massage, < masser, knead: see mass[2].] In therapeutics, the act or art of applying intermittent pressure and strain to the muscles and other accessible tissues of the patient. The means employed are rubbing, kneading, and light pounding, combined ordinarily with more or less additional stimulation of the skin, as by friction and slapping. This manipulation furthers the removal of lymph from the parts, which is especially needful when the lymphatic flow is sluggish through lack of muscular exercise; it apparently quickens the blood-circulation through the part, and furnishes gentle vasomotor exercise; it acts possibly as a direct trophic stimulus to muscular and sustentacular tissues; by stretching ligamentous structures it maintains or increases suppleness; in the abdomen it stimulates and aids peristalsis; and as a general stimulation of sensory nerves it may affect favorably the nutrition of the central nervous system. It is represented in the customs of many primitive peoples, and in a developed form constitutes a valuable resource of modern scientific therapeutics.

massage[2] (ma-säzh′), v. t.; pret. and pp. massaged, ppr. massaging. [< massage[2], n.] In med., to treat by the process called massage.

> Although abdominal massage will effect a great deal of good, it will not be productive of lasting benefit if we omit to massage the spine. Lancet, No. 3418, p. 423.

massagier†, n. A Middle English form of messenger.

massagist (ma-sä′zhist), n. [< massage[2] + -ist.] One who practises massage.

> In a libel action yesterday . . . for a slashing criticism by one massagist of another's book, Judge D—— charged against the prosecution. New York Tribune, May 30, 1889.

Massalia (ma-sā′li-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. Μασσαλία = L. Massilia, Marseilles.] The twentieth of the planetoids, discovered by De Gasparis, at Naples, in 1852. Also Massilia.

Massalian[1] (ma-sā′li-an), n. Same as Euchite.

Massalian[2] (ma-sā′li-an), n. Same as Hesychast.

mass-area (màs′ā″rē-ä), n. See the quotation.

> When a material particle moves from one point to another, twice the area swept out by the vector of the particle multiplied by the mass of the particle is called the mass-area of the displacement of the particle with respect to the origin from which the vector is drawn.
> Maxwell, Matter and Motion, LXVIII.

Massaridæ, Massaris, etc. See Masaridæ, etc.

massasauga (mas-a-sâ′gä), n. [Chippewa misi, great, + sauk, river-mouth.] One of the small but very venomous rattlesnakes which inhabit prairies in the western United States, such as Crotalophorus tergeminus (Sistrurus catenatus). The top of the head is covered with regular plates, as in innocuous serpents, not with scales as in most rattlesnakes; the pit between the eye and the nose is present, as in all Crotalidæ. These snakes are of dark blotched coloration, and a foot or two long. They are also called sidewipers and sideliners, from their habit of wriggling sidewise. The black massasauga is a very dark-colored species or variety, C. kirtlandi.

mass-bell (màs′bel), n. Same as sacring bell (which see, under bell[1]).

> Then with holy water sprinkled
> All the ship; the mass-bells tinkled.
> Longfellow, Wayside Inn, Musician's Tale, xi.

mass-book (màs′bůk), n. [< ME. messebok, < AS. mæsse-bōc, < mæsse, mass, + bōc, book.] The missal, or Roman Catholic service-book.

> To force upon their Fellow-Subjects that which themselves are weary of, the Skeleton of a Masse-Booke.
> Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

mass-center (màs′sen″tėr), n. That position from which as an origin the mean value of all the rectangular or oblique coördinates of the particles of a body is zero. In other words, passing any plane through this point, the sum of the masses of all the particles on the one side of this plane each multiplied by its distance from the plane is the same as the corresponding sum for all the particles on the other side. The mass-center is usually, but loosely, called the center of gravity.

mass-day (màs′dā), n. [< ME. messe-day, mæsse-dæi, < AS. mæsse-dæg, mass-day, < mæsse, mass, + dæg, day.] A day on which high mass is celebrated.

massé[1] (ma-sā′), v. t.; pret. and pp. masséed, ppr. masséing. [< F. massé, pp. of masser, knead: see massage[2].] To perform the operation of massage upon; massage.

> In masséing the face of a fat patient, the tissues can only be rolled and stretched under the fingers and palm.
> Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 660.

massé[2] (ma-sā′, mas′ā), n. [Cf. massé[1].] In billiards, a stroke made with the cue nearly or quite perpendicular, causing the cue-ball to return in a straight line or to move in a circular direction, the direction depending mainly upon the part of the ball to which the cue is applied.

massena (ma-sē′nä), n. [Named after André Masséna (1758–1817), a marshal of France.] In ornith.: (a) A partridge, Cyrtonyx massena. See cut under Cyrtonyx. (b) A trogon, Trogon massena.

masser[1] (màs′ėr), n. A priest who celebrates mass. [Rare.]

> A good masser and so forth; but no true gospel preacher.
> Bale, Yet a Course at the Romysshe Foxe (1543), fol. 38.

masser[2] (mas′ėr), n. [Perhaps a dial. corruption of mercer; but cf. AS. massere (rare), a merchant.] A mercer. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

massé-shot (ma-sā′shot), n. Same as massé[2].

masseter (ma-sē′tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. μασητήρ (not *μασσητήρ), a chew (μῦς μασητήρ, a muscle of the lower jaw), < μασᾶσθαι, chew, prob. akin to μάσσειν, knead: see mass[2].] In anat., one of the principal muscles of mastication, the action of which directly and forcibly closes the mouth. In man the masseter is a stout thick squarish muscle which arises from the malar bone and adjoining parts of the zygomatic arch, and is inserted into the outer surface of the ramus of the lower jaw-bone. See cut under muscle.—Internal masseter, an occasional name of the internal pterygoid muscle, or entopterygoideus.

masseteric (mas-ē-ter′ik), a. [< masseter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the masseter: as, a masseteric vessel or nerve; the masseteric fascia.

masseterine (ma-sē′tėr-in), a. [< masseter + ★-ine[2].] Same as masseteric.

masseur (ma-sėr′), n. [F., < masser, knead: see massage[2].] A man who practises massage.

masseuse (ma-sėz′), n. [F., fem. of masseur: see masseur.] A woman who practises massage.

mass-gospeller†, n. A Romanist.

> Who would desire a two years' merry life for an eternal sorrow? as these mass-gospellers do, which yet are uncertain of two years' life.
> J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 105.

mass-house (màs′hous), n. A Roman Catholic house of worship: an opprobrious term.

> From this time [about 1744] mass-houses, though without any regular legal sanction, appear to have been freely permitted, and religious worship was celebrated without fear.
> Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., p. 304.

massicot (mas′i-kot), n. [Incorrectly masticot; < F. massicot.] Protoxid of lead, or yellow oxid of lead, PbO. Melted lead exposed to the air becomes covered with a yellowish-gray dusky pellicle. This pellicle is carefully taken off, and is oxidized by exposure to air and a moderate heat to a greenish-gray powder, inclining to yellow. This oxid, separated from the grains of lead by sifting, and exposed to a heat sufficient to make it red-hot, but not to melt it, assumes a deep-yellow color. In this state it is called massicot, but does not differ chemically from litharge, though different in color and mechanical condition. After melting it has a reddish tint, and is called litharge. Massicot, slowly heated by a moderate fire, is further oxidized to minium or red lead. It is sometimes used as a pigment, and as a drier in the composition of ointments and plasters. Also called lead-ocher.

massif (ma-sēf′), n. [F.: see massive.] A central mountain-mass; the dominant part of a range of mountains; a part of a range which appears, from the position of the depressions by which it is more or less isolated, to form an independent whole; also, an orographic block or fault-block (German scholle); a band or zone of rocks raised or depressed between two largely developed parallel faults. The French word massif is occasionally used with these various significations in default of any good and familiar English term, especially by geologists writing on the Alps.

Massilia (ma-sil′i-ä), n. Same as Massalia.

Massilian (ma-sil′i-an), a. [< L. Massilianus, < Massilia, Gr. Μασσαλία, Marseilles. Cf. Marseillais.] Of or belonging to Marseilles. Applied specifically to the members of a Christian school, most numerous at Marseilles, later and more usually called Semi-Pelagians.

massily† (màs′i-li), adv. Massively.

massiness (màs′i-nes), n. The state of being massy; greatness of bulk; ponderousness from size or density.

massing-chalice (màs′ing-chal″is), n. A chalice used in the service of the mass, as distinguished from any other cup.

massive (màs′iv), a. [= D. massief = G. Dan. Sw. massiv, < F. massif, bulky, massive, < masse, mass: see mass[2] and -ive.] 1. Forming or consisting of a large mass; solid; having great size and weight; heavy; weighty; ponderous: as, a massive weapon.

> The common military sword is a heavy, massive weapon, for close engagement. Horsley, Works, I. vii.
>
> The tallest of my folios, Opera Bonaventuræ, choice and massive divinity, to which its two supporters (. . . Bellarmine and Holy Thomas) showed but as dwarfs—itself an Ascapart. Lamb, Elia, p. 34.

2. Existing in mass or masses; massed or aggregated; not separated into parts or elements: specifically applied in psychology to sensations or feelings.

> As this aggregate [of pleasurable recollections] grows by accumulation, it becomes vague in proportion as it becomes massive. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 513.
>
> The entrance into a warm bath gives our skin a more massive feeling than the prick of a pin.
> W. James, Mind, XII. 1.
>
> The distinction in pleasures (and in pains) between the acute and voluminous or massive (Intensity and Quantity) is pregnant with vital results.
> A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 12.

3. Pertaining to the whole mass or bulk of anything; total, as to mass; not special, local, or partial.

Opposing massive to localised or specialised stimulation.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, Oct., 1886, p. 134.

4. In mineral., without crystalline form, although perhaps crystalline in structure: as, a mineral that occurs massive. A mineral which is both massive and non-crystalline is said to be amorphous. — 5. In geol., homogeneous; destitute of structural divisions, such as planes of stratification or jointing. By some geologists the term massive is used as synonymous with eruptive or Plutonic igneous, but such rocks often have one or more well-marked systems of joints, and are by no means homogeneous. 6. In zoöl., massed: applied to the type of structure represented by the mollusks. Von Baer. [Rare.] — Massive eruption, in geol., the pouring forth of lava from a line or system of fissures, so that vast areas have become covered by nearly horizontal sheets of eruptive material. = Syn. 1. Massy, Ponderous, etc. See bulky.

massively (más'iv-li), adv. In a mass; ponderously.

massiveness (más'iv-nes), n. The state or quality of being massive, in any sense; specifically, great weight with bulk; massiness; ponderousness.

mass-meeting (más'mē″ting), n. A public meeting of persons in mass, or of all classes, to consider or listen to the discussion of some matter of common interest.

massmonger† (más'mung″gėr), n. One who celebrates mass; a Romanist; one who believes in the sacrifice of the mass: an opprobrious term.

Our Papists have another will, which the massmongers will more willingly follow than God's will.
J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 315.

massondew†, n. Same as measondue.

Massonia (ma-sō'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Thunberg, 1781), named after F. Masson, a botanical writer and explorer of the 18th century.] A genus of liliaceous plants of the tribe Scilleæ, the onion family, and type of the subtribe Massonieæ. They have a regular cylindrical perianth-tube, with five equal, spreading, or reflexed lobes, and six stamens, which are longer than the perianth, and are united by their filaments into a ring at the base. They are bulbous herbs, with two ovate radical leaves which lie flat on the ground, and an umbel-like head of numerous usually white flowers. The scape is very short, the head being almost sessile between the leaves, and surrounded by a many-leafed membranous involucre. About 20 species are known, all from the south of Africa; several of them are cultivated for their singular appearance.

Massonieæ (mas-ō-nī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), ⟨ Massonia + -eæ.] A subtribe of liliaceous plants of the tribe Scilleæ. It is characterized by a coated bulb, a very short scape, subsessile between the leaves, and a dense umbel of flowers, surrounded by an involucre of from three to an indefinite number of bracts. mast[1] (mást), n. [⟨ ME. mast, ⟨ AS. mæst = D. mast = MLG. LG. mast = OHG. MHG. G. mast = Icel. mastr = Sw. Dan. mast (not recorded in Goth.); hence OF. mast, F. mât = Pr. mat, mast = Pg. masto, mastro, mast; perhaps radically connected with L. malus, a mast, pole.] 1. A pole or pillar of round timber, or of tubular iron or steel, secured at the lower end to the keel of a vessel, and rising into the air above the deck to support the yards, sails, and rigging in general. A mast is composed either of a single piece, or of several pieces united by iron bands. When it is of several pieces, it is called a built mast or a made mast. In all large vessels the masts are composed of several lengths, called lower mast, topmast, and topgallantmast. The royalmast is now made in one piece with the topgallantmast. A mast consisting of a single length is called a pole-mast. In a full-rigged ship with three masts, each of three pieces, the masts are distinguished as the foremast, the mainmast, and the mizzenmast; and the pieces as the foremast (proper), foretopmast, foretopgallantmast, etc. In vessels with two masts, they are called the foremast and mainmast; in vessels with four masts, the aftermast is called the spanker-mast or jigger-mast.

Anone the mastyr commaundeth fast

2. Any tall pole.

We passe by severall tall masts set up to guide travellers, so as for many miles they stand in ken of one another like to our beacons. Evelyn, Diary, March 23, 1646.

Electric-light masts, and telegraph poles with their close network of wires crossing and recrossing and literally obscuring the sun. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 222.

3. The main upright member of a derrick or crane, against which the boom abuts. Car-Builder's Dict. — At the mast, on the spar-deck at the mainmast, the official place of interview between men of the United States navy and their officers when a request is to be made or an offense investigated. — Before or afore the mast. See before. — Captain of the mast†. See mastman. — Dolphin of the mast. See dolphin. — Hand-mast, a mast-makers' name for a round spar, at least 24 and not exceeding 72 inches in circumference. Such spars are measured by the hand of four inches, there being a fixed proportion between the number of hands in the length of the mast and that contained in the circumference, taken at one third of the length from the butt-end. Laslett. [Eng.] — Military mast, a mast carried by a war-ship for fighting purposes only, and not for setting sail. Naval ships of large size are usually provided with one or more military masts, carrying armored tops or platforms on which are mounted machine-guns. Such masts are also used for signaling and to provide stations for lookouts, and, in time of action, for small-arm men. Where more than one top is placed on a military mast, the lower one carries the machine-guns, and the upper the lookouts and small-arm men. Such masts are also fitted with derricks for hoisting torpedo-boats, etc., out and in. — Sliding-gunter mast, a small mast fitted for sliding upward on another mast by means of hoops or rings. It is used principally for boats, but formerly served as a skysail-mast rigged above a royalmast. — Spencer-mast, a spar attached abaft the foremast or mainmast to receive the rings or hoops of a spencer. — To spend or expend a mast. See spend. — Trysail-mast, or spanker-mast, a small mast (similar to a spencer-mast) abaft a lower mast for carrying the hoops to which a trysail or spanker is bent.

Spencer-mast.
Mast with Spencer-mast attached.

Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Coward.

Masters o' the people,
We do request your kindest ears.
Shak., Cor., ii. 2. 55.

He remains master of the field.
Bacon, Political Fables, ix., Expl.

They had reason to fear that, if he prospered in England, he would become absolute master of Holland.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., ix.

Specifically —(a) A male teacher or instructor in a school, more especially the sole or head teacher; a schoolmaster.

There, in his noisy mansion skilled to rule,
The village master taught his little school.
Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 196.

(b) The navigator of a ship. In the merchant marine the master is the captain or commander. In men-of-war the navigator or sailing-master formerly had the specific title of master, and was a line-officer of the lowest rank. In the British navy his title is now navigating-lieutenant or staff-commander. In the United States navy it formerly designated a distinct rank, between ensign and lieutenant, but in 1883 the title was changed to lieutenant (junior grade): the duties of the navigator are performed by the line-officer next in rank below the executive officer.

2. One who has another or others under his immediate control; a lord paramount or employer of slaves, vassals, domestic servants, workmen, or laborers, etc.; in law, specifically, one who has in his own right and by virtue of contract a legal personal authority over the services of another, such other being called his servant. The important distinction between the relation of master and servant and that of principal and agent lies in the fact that a master is liable to third persons for the errors of his servant to a greater degree than principals generally are for the errors of agents or employees over whom such authority does not exist, and in the fact that a servant has not always the same remedy against his master for injuries suffered in the course of employment as one not a servant might have.

No man euer throue by suing his Lord or Maister.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

It fares not by fathers as by masters it doeth fare,
For a foolish father may get a wise sonne,
But of a foolish master it haps very rare
Is bread a wise seruant where euer he wonne.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 203.

Evelyn, Diary, Dec. 2, 1674.

I listened with delight
To pastoral melody or warlike air,
Drawn from the chords of the ancient British harp
By some accomplished master.
Wordsworth, Excursion, vii.

7. A title of address, formerly in use, corresponding to magister (which see). Abbreviated M. Master is now changed to mister in ordinary speech, and used in its unchanged form only before the name of a boy, or by a servile dependent to a superior, or sometimes (especially in irony) by a superior to an inferior, as in the second quotation. See mister[1].

The Pharisees answered, saying, Master, we would see a sign from thee.
Mat. xii. 38.

Master doctor, have you brought those drugs?
Shak., Cymbeline, i. v. 4.

In the city of Glocester M. Bird of the chappell met with Tarlton, who, joyfull to regreet other, went to visit his friends; amongst the rest, M. Bird, of the queenes chappell, visited M. Woodcock of the colledge. . . . So Master Woodcock like a woodcock bit his lip.

master-joint (mȧs'tėr-joint), n. In geol., the most marked or best-defined system of joints or divisional planes by which a rock is intersected. Many rocks are traversed by two systems of joints nearly at right angles with each other; one of these is frequently decidedly better defined than the other, and any joint of this system would be designated as a master-joint. If there are two well-developed systems of joints and another which is less so, the former would both be included under the designation of master-joints.

master-key (mȧs'tėr-kē), n. 1. A key which opens (masters) many locks so differently constructed that the key proper to each will open none of the others.

A very Master-Key to every Body's strong Box.
Congreve, Way of the World, iii.

2. Figuratively, a general clue to lead out of many difficulties; a guide to the solution of many questions or doubts.

The discernment of characters is the master key of human policy. Goldsmith, Phanor.

masterless (mȧs'tėr-les), a. [< ME. maisterles; < master[1] + -less.] 1. Not having a master; uncontrolled or unprotected by a master. In England, in early times, a masterless man—that is, one who could not prove either that he was a freeman or that he was under the control of a master—was beyond the pale of the law, and could legally be treated as a vagabond, or consigned to a master, or even put to death. Negroes were subject to similar conditions in the southern United States during the existence of slavery.

A masterless man? . . . He had better not to speak to me, unless he is in love with gaol and gallows.
Kingsley, Westward Ho, vii.

In English society of a far later time we find "masterless men" to be a name of thieves, beggars, and peace-breakers.
F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 30.

2. Free from mastery or ownership; liberated from or not subject to a master; having unrestrained liberty.

Ther sholde ye se stedes and horse renne maisterles, their reynes trailynge vndir fote, wher-of the sadeles were all blody of knyghtes that ther-ynne hadde be slayn.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 211.

What mean these masterless and gory swords?
Shak., R. and J., v. 3. 142.

3. That cannot be mastered; ungovernable; beyond control.

Such vast heath-fires are lighted up that they often get to a masterless head. Gilbert White.

masterlessness (mȧs'tėr-les-nes), n. The state or quality of being masterless or without a master; unrestrainedness. Hare.

masterliness (mȧs'tėr-li-nes), n. The condition or quality of being masterly; masterly ability or skill.

master-lode (mȧs'tėr-lōd), n. Same as champion lode (which see, under lode[1]).

masterly (mȧs'tėr-li), a. [= D. meesterlijk = MLG. mēsterlik = OHG. meistarlīh, MHG. meisterlīch, G. meisterlich = Sw. mästerlig = Dan. mesterlig; as master[1] + -ly[1].] 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of a master; characteristic of one who is master of his art or subject.

But when action or persons are to be described, . . . how bold, how masterly are the strokes of Virgil!
Dryden, Account of Annus Mirabilis.

2. Acting like a master; imperious; domineering; masterful. [Rare.]

masterly (mȧs'tėr-li), adv. [= D. meesterlijk = MLG. mesterlike = OHG. meistarlīhho, MHG. meisterlīche, G. meisterlich; as master[1] + -ly[2].] In a masterly manner; with the skill or ability of a master.

Masterly done:
The very life seems warm upon her lip.
Shak., W. T., v. 3. 66.

masterous†, mastrous† (mȧs'tėr-us, -trus), a. [Formerly also maistrous; < master[1] + -ous.] Characteristic of a master; masterly; skilful.

Must we learne from Canons and quaint Sermonings interlin'd with barbarous Latin to illumin a period, to wreath an Enthymema with maistrous dexterity?
Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

masterpiece (mȧs'tėr-pēs), n. 1. A work or performance of a master; a piece of work of surpassing excellence; any performance or production superior to others of its kind, whether by the same person or by others.

Here we must rest; this is our master-piece;
We cannot think to go beyond this.
B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 1.

At an earlier period they had studied the master-pieces of ancient genius. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

2†. Chief excellence or talent.

There is no master-piece in art like policy.
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, iv. 2.

Dissimulation was his masterpiece.
Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

master-prize† (mȧs'tėr-prīz), n. A masterly or commanding stroke; a move, stroke, or game worthy of a master hand or mind.

She hath play'd her master-prize, a rare one.
Fletcher, Pilgrim, iii. 4.

There is some notable masterprize of roguery
This drum strikes up for.
Middleton, Game at Chess, iii. 1.

mastership (mȧs'tėr-ship), n. [= OFries. masterskip, mesterskip = D. meesterschap = MLG. mēsterschop = OHG. meisterscaft, MHG. G. meisterschaft = Sw. mästerskap = Dan. mesterskab; as master[1] + -ship.] 1. The state or office of a master; a master's position or rank: as, the mastership of a school, or of a vessel.

Yet these conscientious Men . . . wanted not boldness . . . to seize into their hands, or not unwillingly to accept, . . . Collegiate Masterships in the Universities.
Milton, Hist. England, iii.

The kinds of this seignoury, Seneca makes two: the one, . . . power or command; the other, . . . propriety or mastership. Raleigh, Hist. World, I. ix. § 1.

2. Masterly skill or capacity; superiority; mastery.

That, when the sea was calm, all boats alike
Show'd mastership in floating. Shak., Cor., iv. 1. 7.

Where noble youths for mastership should strive.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i.

3†. A chief work; a masterpiece.

Two youths of royal blood, renown'd in fight,
The mastership of Heaven in face and mind.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 318.

4†. In address, your mastership, like your lordship, etc. Sometimes contracted to maship.

How now, Signior Launce! what news with your mastership? Shak., T. G. of V., iii. 1. 280.

Save your mastership!
Do you know us, sir?
Fletcher (and another ?), Prophetess, iii. 1.

master-sinew (mȧs'tėr-sin″ū), n. In farriery, the tendon of the gastrocnemius muscle, which is inserted into the hock. It corresponds to the tendon of Achilles in man.

mastersinger (mȧs'tėr-sing″ėr), n. [Tr. of MHG. meistersinger, G. meistersinger (G. also meistersänger); < meister, master, + singer, singer.] One of a class of German poets and musicians, chiefly peasants and artisans, who began to form gilds or societies for the cultivation of their art in the fourteenth century. Nuremberg was their principal seat, and Hans Sachs, a shoemaker of that place, was the most celebrated of them; but societies were founded in all the principal cities, many of which were maintained till the seventeenth century, while that of Ulm continued in existence till 1839.

Through these streets so broad and stately, these obscure and dismal lanes, Walked of yore the Mastersingers, chanting rude poetic strains. Longfellow, Nuremberg.

master-spring (mȧs'tėr-spring), n. The spring which sets in motion or regulates the whole work or machine.

master-stroke (mȧs'tėr-strōk), n. 1. A masterly achievement; a wonderfully clever or successful action.

How oft, amazed and ravished, you have seen
The conduct, prudence, and stupendous art,
And master-strokes in each mechanick part.
Sir R. Blackmore.

2. In art, an important or capital line.

Some painters will hit the chief lines and masterstrokes of a face so truly that, through all the differences of age, the picture shall still bear a resemblance.
Waller, Poems, ii., Pref.

Paul should himself direct me: I would trace
His master-strokes, and draw from his design.
Cowper, Task, ii. 398.

master-touch (mȧs'tėr-tuch), n. The touch or finish of a master.

I have here only mentioned some master-touches of this admirable piece. Tatler, No. 156.

master-wheel (mȧs'tėr-hwēl), n. The main or chief wheel in a machine; specifically, a wheel which acts as a driver or imparts motion to other parts, as the large cog-wheel of a horse-power.

masterwork (mȧs'tėr-wėrk), n. [= MLG. mēsterwerk = G. meisterwerk = Sw. mästerverk = Dan. mesterværk; as master[1] + work.] Principal performance; masterpiece; chef-d'œuvre.

Yet let me touch one point of this great act,
That famous siege, the master-work of all.
Daniel, Death of the Erle of Devonshire.

Here by degrees his master-work arose.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, ii. 19.

masterwort (mȧs'tėr-wėrt), n. [A tr. of Imperatoria: sense variously explained.] A name of several umbelliferous plants. (a) Properly, Imperatoria (Peucedanum) Ostruthium, a native of central Europe, formerly much cultivated as a pot-herb. Its root is an aromatic stimulant. (b) An American plant, Heracleum lanatum. Its root has stimulant and carminative properties. (c) Angelica atropurpurea, an infusion of which is sometimes used in flatulent colic.—Dwarf masterwort, Hacquetia Epipactis.—Great black masterwort, Astrantia major.—Small black masterwort, Astrantia minor.—Wild or English masterwort. Same as herb-gerard.

mastery (mȧs'tėr-i), n. [< ME. mastry, maistry, maystrye, maistrie, meystry, < OF. maistrie (= Sp. maestría = Pg. mestria = It. maestria), mastery, < maistre, master: see master[1], n.] 1. The state of being a master; power of command or control; rule; dominion; sway.

A monk ther was, a fair for the maistrie.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 165.

For hot, cold, moist, and dry, four champions fierce,
Strive here for mastery. Milton, P. L., ii. 899.

Their mastery of the sea gave them along every coast a secure basis of operations.
J. R. Green, Conquest of England, iii.

2. Ascendancy in war or in competition; the upper hand; superiority; preëminence.

It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery.
Ex. xxxii. 18.

Riding of this steed, brother Bredbeddle,
The mastery belongs to me.
Ballad of King Arthur (Child's Ballads, I. 242).

3. Expert knowledge or skill; power of using or exercising; dexterity: as, the mastery of an art or science.

The 16 medicyn agens the feuere pestilenciale, and the maistrie to cure it.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 23.

O, had I now your manner, maistry, might, . . .
How would I draw! B. Jonson, Poet to the Painter.

He could attain to a mastery in all languages. Tillotson.

4. Masterly attainment; the gaining of mastership.

Now I wole teche 3ou the maistrie of departynge of gold fro siluir whanne thei be meyngid togidere.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 9.

A science whose mastery demands a whole life of laborious diligence. Story, Misc. Writings, p. 340.

5†. A contest for superiority. Holland.

He would often times run, leap, and prove masteries with his chiefe courtiers.
Knolles, Hist. Turks (1603). (Nares.)

The youth of the severall wards and parishes contend in other masteries and pastimes. Evelyn, Diary, Jan., 1646.

6†. A masterly operation or act; a triumph of skill.

Taketh good heed, ye shul wel seen at ye,
That I wol doon a maistrie er I go.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 49.

No maystry is it to get a friend, but for to keepe him long. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 91.

7†. The finding of the magisterium or philosopher's stone; also, the stone itself.

I am the lord of the philosopher's stone, . . .
I am the master of the mastery.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 1.

mastful (mȧst'fûl), a. [< mast[2] + -ful.] Abounding with mast, or the fruit of the oak, beech, and other forest-trees.

masthead (mȧst'hed), n. 1. The top or head of the mast of a ship or vessel; technically, the top or head of the lower mast, but by extension the highest point of the mast. Thus, a sailor may be sent to the masthead (the top of the lower mast) as a lookout-man, or for punishment: to carry the colors at the masthead is to carry them at the highest point of the mast.

2. One who is stationed at the masthead: as, the sundown masthead.

masthead (mȧst'hed), v. t. [< masthead, n.] 1. To raise to the masthead; place or display at the masthead.

In a minute the flag, jack down, was mastheaded, and fluttering its fair folds upon the breeze.
W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xlvii.

2. To punish, as a sailor, by sending to the masthead (the top of one of the lower masts) for a certain or an indefinite time.

The next morning I was regularly mastheaded.
Marryat, Frank Mildmay, iv. (Davies.) mast-hoop (mȧst'höp), n. A wooden or iron hoop on a mast.

mast-house, masting-house (mȧst'-, mȧs'ting-hous), n. A large roofed building in which masts are made or prepared for use.

mastic (mas'tik), n. and a. [Also mastich, formerly also mastick; < ME. mastik = D. mastik, < F. mastic = Pr. mastic, mastec = Sp. obs. mástic (usually almáciga, < Ar. al-mastake) = Pg. mastique = It. mastice, mastico (= G. mastix, < LL. ML. mastix), < L. mastiche, also mastice, LL. mastichum and mastix, < Gr. μαστίχη, mastic, so called because used as in the East as chewing-gum, < μαστίζειν, chew: cf. μάσταξ, the mouth (see mastax, mustache), < μασᾶσθαι, chew. Hence ult. masticate.] I. n. 1. A resinous substance obtained from the common mastic-tree, Pistacia Lentiscus, a small tree about 12 feet high, native in the countries around the Mediterranean. The commercial article is derived principally from the Levant, and especially from the island of Chios. The greater part is obtained from artificial incisions in the bark of the tree. It comes in yellow, brittle, transparent, rounded tears, which soften between the teeth with bitterish taste and aromatic smell. About 90 per cent. of mastic is dissolved in alcohol, the residue constituting the substance masticin. Its solution in turpentine constitutes a varnish much used in painting in oil. In the East mastic is chewed by the women.

2. A similar resin yielded by some other plant. Algerian or Barbary mastic is afforded by Pistacia Terebinthus, a tree of the same region as P. Lentiscus. In India a mastic is obtained from P. Khinjuke and P. mutica. At the Cape of Good Hope a shrubby composite plant, Euryops Athanasiæ, called resin-bush, yields a gum which serves as mastic. The Peruvian mastic-tree is Schinus Molle; the West Indian is Terebinthus Simarouba, a lofty tree from all parts of which a resinous gum exudes.

3. A mastic-tree.

A line of sandy hills, covered with thickets of myrtle and mastic, shut off the view of the plain and meadows.
B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 43.

4. A distilled liquor, most commonly obtained from grapes or grape-skins after the wine is pressed, flavored with the gum mastic and sometimes with anise or fennel, becoming opaline when mixed with water, much drunk in Turkey, Greece, and the islands. The best is made in Chios.—5. A kind of mortar or cement used for plastering walls. It is composed of finely ground oölitic limestone mixed with sand and litharge, and is used with a considerable portion of linseed-oil: it sets hard in a few days, and is much used in works where great expedition is required.—Asphaltic mastic. Same as asphalt, 2.—Bituminous mastic. See bituminous cement, under bituminous.

II. a. Adhesive, as or with gum or mastic.

Gellia wore a velvet mastick patch.
Bp. Hall, Satires, vi. 1.

masticable (mas'ti-ka-bl), a. [< mastic(ate) + -able.] Capable of being chewed; susceptible of mastication.

masticate (mas'ti-kāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. masticated, ppr. masticating. [< LL. masticatus, pp. of masticare, chew (> It. masticare = Sp. masticar, obs. mastigar = Pg. mastigar = OF. mascher, F. mâcher, chew), orig. chew mastic (not from the ancient and rare Gr. μαστιχᾶν, gnash the teeth, which is, however, remotely related), < mastiche, mastice, mastic: see mastic, n.] 1. To grind with the teeth, and prepare for swallowing and digestion; chew: as, to masticate food.

Now I eat my meals with pain,
Averse to masticate the grain.
Cotton, Fables, vi.

2. To prepare for use by cutting or kneading, as with a masticator.

Mr. Hancock . . . had a cylinder made of masticated rubber, of a convenient size. Ure, Dict., I. 693.

mastication (mas-ti-kā'shon), n. [= F. mastication = Sp. masticación = Pg. mastigação = It. masticazione, < ML. masticatio(n-)*, < LL. masticare, chew: see masticate.] 1. The act of chewing; the process of triturating food with the teeth; manducation.—2. The process of tearing to pieces or kneading, as india-rubber, by means of the masticator.—Muscles of mastication, the muscles specially concerned in the act of chewing, being those by whose action the lower jaw is moved upward and sidewise. They constitute a special group of muscles, deriving their innervation from the motor filaments of the trigeminus nerve. In man these muscles are the temporalis, masseter, and external and internal pterygoid.

masticator (mas'ti-kā-tor), n. [= Sp. masticador, a horse's bit, = Pg. mastigador = It. masticatore, masticator, < NL. masticator, < LL. masticare, chew: see masticate.] One who or that which masticates or chews. Specifically—(a) A small kind of mincing-machine for cutting up meat for aged persons or others unable to chew properly. (b) A machine used in purifying india-rubber or gutta-percha, consisting of a shaft set with strong teeth and revolving in a case in which the material to be purified is placed. (c) In entom., sometimes used for the organs of the mouth employed in mastication—the maxillæ and mandibles. Kirby.

masticatory (mas'ti-kā-tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. masticatoire = Pr. mastiguatori = Sp. It. masticatorio, < NL. masticatorius*, < LL. masticare, chew: see masticate, masticator.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to mastication; used in or effected by chewing: as, the masticatory apparatus or process.—Masticatory mouth, in entom., a mouth provided with well-developed mandibles and maxillæ, as in Coleoptera and Hymenoptera. Also called mandibulate mouth.—Masticatory sac or stomach, a stomach which serves for the trituration and comminution of food by a process analogous to chewing, as the muscular gizzard of a bird, with its dense, tough, and sometimes bony epithelial lining, or the highly chitinized stomach of a crustacean, with its elaborate set of tooth-like processes.

II. n.; pl. masticatories (-riz). A substance chewed to excite the secretion of saliva.

The root [of the cocoanut-palm] is used as a masticatory.
Bessey, Botany, p. 464.

mastic-cement (mas'tik-sē-ment″), n. Same as mastic, 5.

mastic-cloth (mas'tik-klôth), n. A kind of canvas made for needlework.

mastich, mastiche, n. See mastic.

mastic-herb (mas'tik-ėrb), n. A low shrubby plant, Thymus mastichina, having a strong agreeable smell, like mastic. It grows in Spain.

masticic (mas-tis'ik), a. [< mastic + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mastic.

masticin (mas'ti-sin), n. [= F. masticine = It. masticino; as mastic + -in[2].] A substance ($C_{20}H_{31}O$) which remains undissolved on dissolving mastic in alcohol. It amounts to about a tenth of the mastic employed, and has while moist all the characters of caoutchouc, but becomes brittle when dried.

mastick†, n. and a. I. n. An obsolete spelling of mastic.

II. a. [Appar. an attrib. use of mastic with ref. to masticate.] Masticatory: only in the following passage, where modern editions have mastiff.

When rank Thersites opes his mastick jaws,
We shall hear music, wit, and oracle.
Shak., T. and C., i. 3. 73.

Masticophis (mas-tik'ō-fis), n. [NL., prop. Mastigophis*, < Gr. μάστις, a whip, scourge, + ὄφις, a serpent, snake.] A genus of innocuous serpents, of the family Colubridæ, established by Baird and Girard in 1853; the whip-snakes. The type is the coachwhip-snake, M. flagelliformis, a very slender species with smooth scales, found in the southern United States; and others are described.

masticot[1], n. An erroneous form of massicot.

masticot[2]†, n. Mastic.

mastic-tree (mas'tik-trē), n. [< ME. mastic-tree.] 1. A tree which yields mastic, especially Pistacia Lentiscus. See mastic, 1 and 2.

The benes hardde of mastic tree wol serve Ysowe.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 98.

2. A valuable tree of Florida, Sideroxylon Mastichodendron. The wood is very hard and heavy, strong, and close-grained. It resists the attacks of teredo, and is largely used in ship- and boat-building. It bears a plum-like fruit, of a pleasant subacid flavor, eagerly eaten by animals.

masticurous (mas-ti-kū'rus), a. [Also masticourous, prop. mastigurous;* < Gr. μάστις, a whip, scourge, + οὐρά, the tail.] Having a whip-like tail, as the ray.

mastiff (mas'tif), n. [The associated forms (in E. and F.) are of 3 types: (a) mastiff, formerly also mastive, < ME. mastyf, mestif, a mastiff, < OF. mestif, F. métif, of mixed breed, mongrel (chien mestif, a mongrel dog), < ML. mixtivus*, mistivus*, mixed; (b) early mod. E. masty, < ME. mastis, a mongrel, < OF. mestis, F. métis (= Pr. mestis = Sp. mestizo = Pg. mestiço = It. mestizzo), of a mixed breed, mongrel, < ML. mixticius*, misticius*, mixed; (c) mastin* (mestin*, > Sc. messin), < OF. mastin, F. mâtin = Pr. mastin (cf. Sp. mastín, Pg. mastim, It. mastino, ML. mastinus, all appar. < OF.), a mastiff; < ML. mixtinus*, mistinus*, mixed; all three types (ML. mistivus, misticius*, mistinus*) < L. mixtus, mistus, mixed, pp. of miscere, mix: see mix[1]. For the form mast-, ult. < L. mist-, cf. mastlin[2], maslin[2]. This etym. is the only one that satisfactorily explains the various forms involved. Skeat, following Scheler and Diez, supposes mastiff to be lit. 'a house-dog,' the ML. type mastinus being in this view contracted (after Rom.) from masnatinus*, ult. mansionatinus* (sc. canis), < masnata, ult. mansionata* (OF. meisnee, maisnee, etc.), household, family (see many[2], meiny). Minsheu (1625) similarly explains it as "q. maison tenant, i. domum tenens, keeping the house."] A variety of dog of considerable antiquity. A true-bred mastiff is of large size, and very stoutly built. The head is well developed and large, the lips deep and pendulous on each side of the mouth, and the whole aspect noble. The modern breed is more lightly built, with a more slender muzzle.

In alde time was an usage to norrysshe grete mastyuys and sare bytynge dogges in the lytell houses upon the walls, that by them shulde be knowen the comynge of theyre enemyes. Caxton, Fayt of Armes, ii. 158.

As savage bull, whom the fierce mastives bait. Spenser.

mastiff-bat (mas'tif-bat), n. A molossoid or bulldog-bat; a member of the Molossinæ: so called from its physiognomy. See Molossinæ.

Mastigamœba (mas″ti-ga-mē'bä), n. [NL., < Gr. μάστις (μαστιγ-), a whip, scourge, + ἀμοιβή, change, alternation: see amœba.] A remarkable genus of flagellate protozoans, combining the pseudopods of an amœba with a long terminal flagellum. The genus illustrates a group of protozoans which have been called Rhizoflagellata. A species is named M. aspersa.

Mastigamœbidæ (mas″ti-ga-mē'bi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mastigamœba + -idæ.] A family of rhizoflagellate protozoans, typified by the genus Mastigamœba.

mastigium (mas-tij'i-um), n.; pl. mastigia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μάστις (μαστιγ-), a whip.] In entom., one of the prominent organs on the posterior extremity of a very few lepidopterous larvæ, from which threadlike processes can be thrust, as in the European Harpyia vinula. The caterpillars lash their sides with these threads to repel the attacks of ichneumon parasites.

Mastigophora (mas-ti-gof'ō-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of mastigophorus: see mastigophorous.] Same as Flagellata.—Mastigophora trichosomata. Same as Cilioflagellata.

mastigophore (mas'ti-gō-fōr), n. [< Mastigophora.] A flagellate protozoan; any member of the Mastigophora.

mastigophoric (mas″ti-gō-for'ik), a. [< mastigophore + -ic.] Same as mastigophorous, 1. T. L. Peacock, Headlong Hall, vi.

mastigophorous (mas-ti-gof'ō-rus), a. [< Gr. μαστιγοφόρος, bearing a whip, < μάστις (μαστιγ-), a whip, + -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear[1].] 1. Carrying a whip, scourge, or wand. S. Smith.—2. In zoöl., flagellate, as a protozoan; of or pertaining to the Mastigophora.

mastigopod (mas'ti-gō-pod), a. and n. [< NL. mastigopus (-pod-), < Gr. μάστις (μαστιγ-), a whip, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Furnished with cilia or flagella, or both, as a protozoan; of or pertaining to the Mastigopoda.

II. n. A member of the Mastigopoda.

Mastigopoda (mas-ti-gop'ō-dä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of mastigopus: see mastigopod.] All those Protozoa which possess cilia or flagella; the two protozoan classes Ciliata and Flagellata. Huxley.

mastigopodous (mas-ti-gop'ō-dus), a. [As mastigopod + -ous.] Same as mastigopod.

mastigure (mas'ti-gūr), n. [< NL. Mastigurus.] An agamoid lizard of the genus Uromastix: as, the spine-footed mastigure, Uromastix spinipes.

Mastigurus (mas-ti-gū'rus), n. [NL., < Gr. μάστις (μαστιγ-), a whip, + οὐρά, a tail.] Same as Uromastix. Fleming.

mastilyon†, n. Same as maslin[2].

masting-house (mȧst'ing-hous), n. See masthouse.

mastist†, n. A Middle English form of masty[2].

mastitis (mas-tī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μαστός, the breast, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the mammary gland. Also called mammitis.

mastivet†, n. An obsolete form of mastiff. Minsheu; Cotgrave.

mastless[1] (mȧst'les), a. [< mast[1] + -less.] Having no mast: as, a mastless vessel.

mastless[2] (mȧst'les), a. [< mast[2] + -less.] Bearing or producing no mast: as, a mastless beech.

A crown of mastless oak adorned her head.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, ii.

mastlin[1]†, n. See maslin[1].

mastlin[2]†, n. See maslin[2].

mastman (mȧst'man), n.; pl. mastmen (-men). A seaman stationed at a mast in a man-of-war to keep the ropes clear and in order. In the British service, formerly called captain of the mast.

mastoccipital (mas-tok-sip'i-tal), a. [< masto(id) + occipital.] Common to the mastoid and the occipital bone: as, the mastoccipital suture. Also masto-occipital.

mastodon (mas'tō-don), n. [NL., so called with ref. to the mammillary processes on the molar teeth; < Gr. μαστός, breast (mammilla), + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. An extinct proboscidean quadruped of the family Elephantidæ and subfamily Mastodontinæ. Several genera and rather numerous species have been discovered in Tertiary deposits of most parts of the world, in some cases associated with those of the mammoth. One of the largest and best-known of these is the Mastodon americanus. The most complete and best-known skeleton was obtained from a peat-bog in Orange County, N. Y., in 1845, and is known as the Warren mastodon. Its height is eleven feet, length seventeen feet, total length of tusk ten feet eleven inches, external length eight feet eight inches, circumference of trunk sixteen feet five inches. See cut on following page.

2. [cap.] The typical genus of Mastodontinæ, formerly held to include all the mastodons, now restricted to those of the tetralophodont series, such as M. avernensis of Europe.

mastodont (mas'tō-dont), a. and n. [< mastodon(t-).] I. a. Having teeth like a mastodon; tubercular, as a mastodon's tooth.

II. n. A mastodon.

mastodontic (mas-tō-don'tik), a. [< mastodont + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mastodon; resembling a mastodon; of mammoth size: as, mastodontic dimensions. Everett.

Mastodontinæ (mas″tō-don-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mastodon (-odont-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of Elephantidæ typified by the genus Mastodon, distinguished from Elephantinæ by the character of the molar teeth; mastodons. The ridges of the molars increase in number by one or more on the successive teeth, and have more or fewer mammilliform Mastodon (Mastodon americanus).

Skeleton discovered at Cohoes, New York, 1866; now in the State Museum of Natural History, Albany.

tubercles, while the intervening valleys have little or no cement. The fact is now recognized that the mastodons are so closely allied in every respect to the least specialized elephants that there is really no distinction between Mastodon and Elephas.

mastodontine (mas-tō-don'tin), a. Of or pertaining to the Mastodontinæ: distinguished from elephantine in a technical sense.

mastodynia (mas-tō-din'i-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μαστός, the breast, + ὀδύνη, pain.] In pathol., ★pain in the mammary gland.

mastoid (mas'toid), a. and n. [< Gr. μαστοειδής, like the breast, < μαστός, the breast, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Teat-like; shaped like a nipple: specifically applied in anatomy to a part or process of the temporal bone, from its shape in man. See below.—Mastoid artery, a small branch of the posterior auricular artery; also, a small branch of the occipital artery which enters the mastoid foramen.—Mastoid cells, a number of irregular spaces or cavities in the substance of the mastoid process of the temporal bone, communicating with one another and with the cavity of the tympanum.—Mastoid foramen. See foramen.—Mastoid muscle, the sternoclidomastoideus.—Mastoid process of the temporal bone, the mastoid. See cuts 1 and 2 under skull.

II. n. 1. The mastoid part or process of the temporal bone: in adult man, a conical nipple-like bony prominence below and behind the orifice of the ear, to which the sternoclidomastoid, trachelomastoid, digastric, and other muscles are attached, and which is grooved for the passage of the occipital artery. It is not a distinct element of the compound temporal bone, having no independent center of ossification, but is merely an outgrowth of the petrosal bone, forming with this the petromastoid. It is scarcely recognizable in infants. The interior is excavated by the numerous mastoid cells.

2. A distinct bone of the skull of some of the lower vertebrates, regarded by Owen as homologous with the mammalian mastoid.

mastoidea, n. Plural of mastoideum.

mastoideal (mas-toi'dē-ạl), a. [< mastoideus + -al.] Same as mastoid.

mastoidean (mas-toi'dē-ạn), a. [< mastoideus + -an.] Same as mastoid.

mastoidei, n. Plural of mastoideus.

mastoideum (mas-toi'dē-um), n.; pl. mastoidea ★(-ạ). [NL., neut.: see mastoideus.] The mastoid, more fully called os mastoideum.

mastoideus (mas-toi'dē-us), n.; pl. mastoidei (-ī). [NL., < Gr. μαστός, breast, + εἶδος, form.] ★The sternoclidomastoideus.

mastoiditis (mas-toi-dī'tis), n. [NL., < mastoideus + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation in the mastoid.

mastoidohumeral (mas-toi-dō-hū'mẹ-rạl), a. [< mastoid + humeral.] Connecting the mastoid part of the temporal bone with the humerus: as, the mastoidohumeral muscle of some animals.

mastological (mas-tō-loj'i-kạl), a. [< mastolog-y + -ic-al.] Same as mammalogical.

mastologist (mas-tol'ō-jist), n. [< mastolog-y + -ist.] Same as mammalogist.

mastology (mas-tol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μαστός, the breast, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Same as mammalogy.

masto-occipital (mas″tō-ok-sip'i-tạl), a. Same as mastoccipital.

mastoparietal (mas″tō-pạ-rī'e-tạl), a. [< masto(id) + parietal.] Common to the mastoid and the parietal bone: as, the mastoparietal suture.

mastopathy (mas-top'ạ-thi), n. [< Gr. μαστός, the breast, + -πάθεια, < πάθος, disease.] In pathol., disease of the mammary gland.

mastotheca (mas-tō-thē'kä), n.; pl. mastothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. μαστός, the breast, + θήκη, a receptacle: see theca.] A cutaneous pouch or fold of the skin in which the nipples of mammary glands are situated, as the marsupium or pouch of the marsupial mammals.

mastotympanic (mas″tō-tim-pan'ik), n. [< masto(id) + tympanum + -ic.] A bone of the skull of some reptiles, which should correspond to the opisthotic quadrate of modern nomenclature. R. Owen.

Mastozoa (mas-tō-zō'ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μαστός, breast, + ζῷον, an animal.] Mammals; the class of Mammalia. De Blainville.

mast-pocket (mȧst'pok″et), n. A heavy casting under a wrecking-car, supported by a derrick truss-rod, serving as a socket for the mast of a derrick to hold it upright. Car-Builder's Dict.

mastress†, n. An obsolete form of mistress.

mast-rope (mȧst'rōp), n. A rope used for sending a topmast or topgallantmast up or down.

mastroust†, a. See masterous.

mast-tree (mȧst'trē), n. 1. One of the trees which produce mast; specifically, the cork-tree. —2. In India, a tall tree, Polyalthia (Guatteria) longifolia, handsome and much planted along avenues: so named doubtless from its erect habit, its wood being useless.

masturbate (mas'tėr-bāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. masturbated, ppr. masturbating. [< L. masturbatus, pp. of masturbari, practise masturbation.] To commit self-abuse.

masturbation (mas-tėr-bā'shọn), n. [< F. masturbation = Sp. masturbación, < NL. masturbatio(n-), < L. masturbari: see masturbate.] Self-defilement; onanism.

masturbational (mas-tėr-bā'shọn-ạl), a. [< masturbation + -al.] Pertaining to or caused by masturbation.

masturbator (mas'tėr-bā-tọr), n. One who masturbates.

masturbatory (mas'tėr-bā-tō-ri), a. [< masturbate + -ory.] Concerned with the practice of masturbation.

masty[1] (mȧs'ti), a. [< ME. masty; < mast[2] + -y[1].] Full of mast, or the fruit of the oak, beech, etc.

Ye masty swyne, ye ydel wreches.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1777.

masty[2]† (mȧs'ti), n. [< ME. mastis, a mongrel, < OF. mestis, F. métis, mongrel: see mastiff. The ME. form seems to have been taken as a plural, whence the later assumed singular masty.] Same as mastiff.

Not a masty upon the castle walls but shall bark too.
Shirley, Maid's Revenge, iv. 1.

The true-bred masty shows not his teeth, nor opens, Till he bites. The Unfortunate Usurper (1663). (Nares.) masuel† (mas-ū-el'), n. [< OF. massuelle, masuele, maçuele, a mace, < masse, mace, a mace: see mace[1].] A war-mace. Also spelled massuelle.

masulah-boat, n. See masoola-boat.

mat[1] (mat), n. [< M.E. matte, < AS. meatta = ★D. mat = LG. matte = OHG. matta, MHG. matte, matze, G. matte = Sw. matta = Dan. matte = W. mat = Ir. mata = It. matta (= OF., with change of initial m to n (as also in napkin, napery, as compared with map), nate, F. natte, > MLG. natte = ME. natte, natt, nat), < L. matta (ML. natta), a mat.] 1. An article plaited or woven of more or less coarse material, as rushes, straw, coir, rope, twine, or thick woolen yarn, of various sizes and shapes according to the use to which it is to be put. Mats are especially used for covering or protecting floors, as door-mats for wiping the shoes upon, etc. A similar but usually lighter material used as packing, for covering floors or passages, etc., is called matting. The skin of an animal with thick hair or wool is sometimes used as a mat; and articles serving as door-mats, and so called, are also made of india-rubber, and even of thin upright strips of steel. Table-mats are thin sheets or plates of straw or the like to set hot dishes upon. In Japan very thick soft mats, consisting of a wooden frame measuring about 6 feet by 3 feet, covered with straw matting and backed with closely packed drawn straws, are used for flooring, resting on posts, and on these the people sit, eat, and sleep. In China and other Asiatic countries portable mats of about the same size are used for beds, and are commonly carried for that purpose in traveling.

Nevtheles ther com to vs Jacobyns and other feynyd Cristen Peple of Sonndry Sectis, that browght to vs mattes ffor our mony to lye upon.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 24.

The women and children in the west of Cornwall make mats of a small and fine kind of bents there growing, which serve to cover floors and walls.
R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

2. A web of rope-yarn used on ships to secure the standing rigging from the friction of the yards, etc.—3†. Matting; woven rushes or straw.

I defy thee,
Thou mock-made man of mat! charge home, sirrah!
Fletcher, Bonduca, iv. 2.

4. A structure of interwoven withes, weeds, brush, or the like, or of fascines, fastened with ropes and wires, used as a revetment on riverbanks, etc.; a mattress.—5. A sack made of matting, such as are used to contain coffee or to cover tea-chests; specifically, such a sack containing a certain quantity of coffee.

The annual receipts of coffee landed at the warehouses in Brooklyn amount to about 2,500,000 mats.
Evening Post, June 13, 1888.

6. Anything closely set, dense, and thick: as, a mat of hair; a mat of weeds.—7. A piece of thick paper, cardboard, or other material placed for protection or ornament immediately under the glass in a picture-frame, with enough of the central part cut out for the proper display of the picture (usually a drawing, engraving, or photograph).—8. In lace-making, the solid or closely worked surface, as distinguished from the more open part.

mat[1] (mat), v.; pret. and pp. matted, ppr. matting. [< mat[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To cover or overlay with mats or matting.

Keep the doors and windows of your conservatories well matted and guarded from the piercing air.
Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense.

2. To make like a mat; cause to resemble a mat; twist together; interweave like a mat; entangle: as, matted hair.

The bank, with daffadillies dight,
With grass like sleave was matted.
Drayton, Quest of Cynthia.

The fibers are matted as wool is in a hat.
N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, i. 4.

His locks were tangled, and his shaggy beard
Matted with filth; in all things else a Greek.
Addison, Æneid, iii.

II. intrans. To grow thick together; become interwoven like a mat.

mat[2]†, a. and v. An obsolete form of mate[2].

mat[3] (mat), a. and n. [Also matt; cf. F. matte, n.; < G. matt, dull, dim, dead (matt-gold, dead gold, matt-blau, pale blue, matt-bunzen, a burnisher, etc.), = E. mate[2], ME. mate, mat, faint, dull, etc.: see mate[2]. The word mat[3] taken in artistic use from G., seems to be confused in part with mat[1], n., paper or cardboard with a more or less dulled or roughened surface used to protect or set off a picture: see mat[1], n., 7.] I. a. Having a dull or dead surface; unpolished; lusterless: as, mat gold; mat silver.

Most kinds of varnish that will dry "bright" under ordinary circumstances will become matt if subjected to a chill, or to the action of damp during the drying.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 297.

II. n. 1. A dull or dead surface, without luster, produced in metals, as gold or silver, by special tools.—2. [< mat[3], v.] An implement by which a mat surface is produced, as in gold or silver.

A very coarse mat is used in representing velvet drapery.
Society of Arts Rep., I. 323.

mat[3] (mat), v. t.; pret. and pp. matted, ppr. matting. [< mat[3], a.] To produce a rough or unpolished surface on (metal), whether by means of a mat or by engraving with a sharp tool.—To mat in, to produce a roughened surface ground in metal-work.

matachin†, matachine† (mat-a-chēn'), n. [Also mattachin; = F. matassins, < Sp. matachín, < Ar. motawajjihin, maskers, pl. of motawajjih, masked, < wajh, face.] A participant in an old comic dance performed by maskers in mock-military guise, originally with sword and buckler, and later with a wooden sword or some other sham weapon; also, the dance itself, and the kind of mask or domino worn in it. The dance became a mere display of tumbling or acrobatic feats.

Lod. We have brought you a mask.
Flam. A matachin it seems, by your drawn swords.
Webster, White Devil. (Nares.)

Whoever saw a matachin dance to imitate fighting, this was a fight that did imitate the matachin.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia.

It was well known in France and Italy by the name of the dance of fools or matachins, who were habited in short jackets, with gilt paper helmets, long streamers tied to their shoulders, and bells to their legs. They carried in their hands a sword and buckler, with which they made a clashing noise, and performed various quick and sprightly evolutions.
Douce, Illus. of Shakspere, II. 435. (Nares.)

To dance a matachin, to fight a duel with swords.

I'd dance a matachin with you Should make you sweat your best blood for 't.
Fletcher (and another), Elder Brother, v. 1.

We may thereby perchance,
Ere many springs, compelled be to dance
Another Matachin.
Wither, Speculum Speculativum (1660), p. 26.

mataco (mat′a-kō), n. [S. Amer.] A small three-banded armadillo, the apar or apara, Dasypus or Tolypeutes tricinctus. Also matacho, ★matico. See cut under apar.

matador (mat-a-dōr′), n. [< Sp. matador (< L. mactator), a slayer, < matar, kill, < L. mactare, kill, sacrifice: see mactation, mactator.] 1. A killer; specifically, the man appointed to kill the bull in bull-fights. He carries in his right hand a naked sword, and in his left the muleta, a small stick with a piece of scarlet silk attached, with which, after the animal has been sufficiently tormented by the picadors and banderilleros, he draws its attention to himself, and then kills it by plunging his sword into its neck. Also written matadore.

In costly sheen and gaudy cloak array'd,
But all afoot, the light-limb'd Matadore
Stands in the centre, eager to invade
The lord of lowing herds.
Byron, Childe Harold, i. 74.

2. One of the three principal cards in the games of omber and quadrille. These three are the ace of clubs, the ace of spades, and the two of trumps should clubs or spades be trumps, or the seven of trumps should hearts or diamonds be trumps.

Now move to war her sable Matadores
In show like leaders of the swarthy Moors.
Pope, R. of the L., iii. 47.

3. In the game of solo, the spadella, manilla, or basta (which three are known as the higher matadors), and, if these are all obtained by one side, any one of all lower cards held in uninterrupted sequence in one hand: the latter are known as lower matadors.—4. In skat. See skat[2], in the supplement.

matafund (mat′a-fund), n. [< ML. matafunda, appar. < Sp. matar, kill (see matador), + L. funda, a sling.] Same as matafunda.

matafunda (mat-a-fun′dä), n. [ML.: see matafund.] An old military engine which threw stones by means of a sling. Grose.

That murderous sling,
The matafunda, whence the ponderous stone Fled fierce. Southey, Joan of Arc, viii.

matagasse†, n. [Also mattagesse, mattagess; < F. (Savoyard) matagasse, a shrike, lit. 'kill-magpie,' < mater (= Sp. Pg. matar, < L. mactare), kill, + agasse, agace, a magpie.] The great gray shrike or butcher-bird of Europe, Lanius excubitor.

Though the matagasse bee a hawke of none account or price, neyther with us in any use.
Book of Falconrie or Hawkinge (London, 1611).

matai (mä′tī), n. [Maori.] A coniferous tree of New Zealand, Nageïa spicata, with a pale or reddish soft durable wood.

matamata (mä-tä-mä′tä), n. [S. Amer.: Pg. matamatá.] 1. A pleurodirous tortoise of the genus Chelys, C. fimbriata or matamata. Its brown carapace is covered with pyramidal eminences, and its body is curiously fimbriated. It inhabits the fresh waters of Brazil and Guiana. See cut under Chelydidæ.

Of the grapes which this Palma Christi or Ricinus doth carie, there be made excellent wicks or matches for lamps and candles. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxiii. 4.

2. In general, anything that takes fire readily either from a spark or by friction, and is used for retaining, conveying, and communicating fire. Formerly, hemp, flax, cotton, or tow dipped in sulphur, coarse paper saturated with niter, a species of dry wood called touchwood, etc., were in common use as matches; and for military purposes a slow-burning cord was used. (See match-cord, match-lock, match-tub.) Early in the nineteenth century an improvement was introduced in the form of a thin slip of wood tipped with sulphur or other combustible matter, which ignited when brought into contact with phosphorus contained in a box or vial. All other domestic devices of the kind, however, were superseded by the friction-match, which was introduced about 1830. See locofoco, lucifer, congreve, vesuvian, fusee, and vesta.

Giving a trifle for oyl, about midnight we departed, having here met with good store of company; such as were allowed travelling with their matches light, and prepared to receive all onsets. Sandys, Travailes, p. 90.

3. In a special sense, a slow-match having the form of a line or cord of indefinite length. See match-cord.

We took a piece of match, such as soldiers use, of the thickness of a man's little finger, or somewhat thicker.
Boyle, Works, I. 29.

The soldiers tied their links of match about their middle. Millan, in Grose's Milit. Antiquities, I. 160.

4†. A match-lock musket.

A great many they were of goodly well proportioned fellowes, as grim as Diuels; yet the very sight of cocking our matches, and being to let fly, a few wordes caused them to leaue their bowes and arrowes to our guard.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 211.

Chemical match, a sort of friction-match, first manufactured at Vienna, tipped with sulphur, and having the end covered with a compound of sugar and chlorate of potash, colored with vermilion, and made adhesive with glue. For ignition it was dipped into a vial containing sulphuric acid. Also called dip-splint.—Incendiary match. See incendiary.—Quick-match, a match made with threads of cotton or with cotton wick, steeped in gummed brandy or whisky, then soaked in a paste of mealed powder and gummed spirits, and afterward strewed with mealed powder. It burns at the rate of a yard in 13 seconds, and is used to prime heavy mortars, etc.—Safety-match, a kind of match which will not ignite by friction unless rubbed on a specially prepared surface, as the side of a box, containing the phosphorus or other necessary part of the combustible composition.—Slow-match, a match made to burn very slowly, as at the rate of 4 or 5 inches an hour, and used for blasting purposes, artillery, etc., and formerly for firing the matchlock.—To prime a match, to render it easily ignitible by putting on the end of it some wet bruised powder made into a sort of paste.

mate[4] (mä'tā), n. [Also maté, matte; Sp., prop. yerba de mate: yerba, herb; de, of; mate, < Quichua mati, a vessel or dish made of calabash.] A species of holly, Ilex Paraguariensis; also, its prepared leaves, or the tea-like beverage made from them. The mate is a small tree, or is reduced to a bush by the cutting of its branches for their leaves. It is found wild on the river-banks of Paraguay and in the neighboring mountainous districts of Brazil, and is cultivated in plantations. The leaves are prepared by roasting and pulverizing. Boiling water is poured over them to form the tea, which is imbibed through a tube, commonly without addition, sometimes with sugar or lemon. It is an aromatic beverage, whose general effects are those of tea and coffee. It is considered very refreshing in fatigue, and is consumed by miners and other heavy laborers. Its use, once adopted, is very difficult to abandon. Also called Brazil or Paraguay tea, Jesuits' tea, and yerba.

matelassé (mat-la-sā'), a. and n. [F., pp. of matelasser, cover with a mattress, < matelas, a mattress: see mattress.] I. a. Having a raised pattern the surface of which looks as if quilted: said of fine textiles, especially silk. He [the King of Spain] had done them some material good Offices. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 3.

How we all came to disregard so material a point is inconceivable. Goldsmith, Vicar, xvi.

A circumstance may be said to be material when it bears a visible relation in point of causality to the consequences; immaterial, when it bears no such visible relation.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, vii. 23.

She repeated to my friend the singular story she had before told him, without any material variation from the detail she had formerly given.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 203.

5†. Full of matter, or of solid sense and observation.

Touch. Honesty coupled to beauty is to have honey a sauce to sugar.
Jaq. A material fool! [Aside.]
Shak., As you Like it, iii. 3. 32.

Beware of being too material when there is any impediment or obstruction in men's wills; for pre-occcupation of mind ever requireth preface of speech.
Bacon, Dispatch (ed. 1887).

What thinks material Horace of his learning?
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Natural and easy as well in her deportment as in her discourse, which was always materiall, not trifling.
Evelyn, Diary, March 10, 1685.

6. In philos., consisting in or pertaining to matter in the Aristotelian sense, and not to form; arising from matter of positive fact, and not from logical implication; referring to the object as it exists, and not to distinctions originating in the mind; relating to a word as an object, and not to its meaning. All these senses come down from the middle ages, and in them material is opposed to formal. In Cartesian and later writings, material often means pertaining to the outward world, as opposed to spiritual. In the Kantian terminology, material means pertaining to or derived from matter in the Kantian sense of that term, namely, that which is contributed to cognition by sense. Examples of the many established phrases in which this word occurs are given below.

7. In the law of evidence, of legal significance in the cause; having such a relation to the question in controversy that it may or ought to have some influence on the determination of the cause. See immaterial issue, under issue.—Material acceptation or supposition, the taking of a spoken or written word as an object of thought.—Material being. See being.—Material cause. See cause, 1.—Material cognition. See cognition.—Material consequence, a consequence, or premise with conclusion, which is valid—that is, of which the conclusion is true whenever the premise is true, but which is so by virtue of a matter of fact, and not by virtue of the logical forms of the premise and conclusion. The use of this term originated with Scotus, who further distinguishes between a necessary and a contingent material consequence, according as the premise needed to be supplied to render the consequence a logical syllogism is a necessary or a contingent proposition.—Material criterion of truth. See criterion.—Material descent, the passage from a genus to a species which comes under it as a matter of fact, but not by logical necessity.—Material distinction, the distinction between different individuals of the same species. This is an example of a use of the word material common with Thomas Aquinas and his followers, which seems to imply that matter is the principle of individuation.—Material fallacy, a fallacy in which the syllogism satisfies all the rules of formal logic, but where the deception belongs to a class of falsifications of premises. Such, for example, are cases where "most" is exaggerated into "all," where we argue post hoc ergo propter hoc, etc.—Material form†, in metaph., a form depending upon matter, and having no independent existence, which is supposed to be true of every form except the human soul.—Material heresy. See heresy, 2.—Material idea. See idea.—Material knowledge. Same as material cognition.—Material logic. See logic.—Material matter of a proposition, the subject and predicate; opposed to the formal matter, which is the fact signified by the proposition.—Material mode, a mode which affects the matter of a proposition: opposed to formal mode, which affects the form.

The material modes affect the matter of the enunciation, viz. either the subject or the predicate. For example, in this enunciation, A good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep, the word bonus or good is the mode of the subject. In this, A rhetorician speaks ornately and copiously, ornately and copiously are the modes of the predicate. Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Material multitude†, the plurality of a number in which the distinctions which may separate the objects are left out of view. It is a Thomist expression.—Material object of a science, the things of which that science takes cognizance, regardless of the point of view from which it considers them. Thus, chemistry and mechanics have the same material object—that is to say, the whole universe.—Material opposition, the opposition between terms which are not opposed in form.—Material perfection of cognition, a perfect acquaintance with the facts, as opposed to a logically distinct apprehension of them.—Material principle, the Aristotelian matter. See matter, 2 (a).—Material science, a science which rests on outward observation, and not on introspection: a Cartesian distinction.—Material sign†, a sign which indicates its object, and shows its real existence, but does not represent it, or exhibit its form: a Thomist phrase.—Material substance, matter in the ordinary sense.—Material supposition. Same as material acceptation.—Material truth, the correspondence of our judgments with their objects: opposed to formal truth, which is mere logical consistency.—Material unity†, that which belongs to an individual as such: a Thomist term.—Material virtue†, a power residing in material things. Aquinas.

II. n. 1. Component or contributory matter or substance; that of or with which any corporeal thing is or may be constituted, made, or done: as, the materials of the soil or of disintegrated rocks; wool is the material of cloth; building- or writing-materials; war-material.

The houses are all built, on the outside, of no better a material than either Sun burnt Brick or Flemish Wall.
Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 124.

The scenery, though for ever changing, changes like the pattern of a kaleidoscope, the same materials readjusted in varying combinations. Froude, Sketches, p. 64.

2. A constituent principle or element; that which composes or makes a part of anything: as, the material of one's thoughts; the materials of a drama.

Concerning the materials of seditions.
Bacon, Seditions and Troubles.

Let none fear that this age, or any coming one, will extirpate the material of poetry.
Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 121.

Raw material, unmanufactured material; material for fabrication in its natural state, or, with reference to some processes of manufacture, in the partially manufactured state to which it must be brought prior to treatment by those processes. Thus, wool is the raw material of yarn, and yarn that of cloth; iron ore is the raw material of pig-iron, and pig-iron that of cast-iron. Statisticians usually classify as raw materials products of the extractive industries in the simplest form in which such products are normally placed on the market.

Strength of materials, that power by which any substance, as a rod, bar, beam, chain, or rope, resists any effort to destroy the cohesion of its parts, whether by pulling or stretching, crushing, or lateral or longitudinal pressure.

material† (mā-tē′ri-al), v. t. [< material, n.] To render material; materialize.

I believe that the whole frame of a beast doth perish, and is left in the same state after death as before it was materialed unto life. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, § 37.

materialisation, materialise. See materialization, materialize.

★materialism (mā-tē′ri-al-izm), n. [First used in E.; = F. matérialisme = Sp. Pg. It. materialismo; as material + -ism.] 1. The denial of the existence in man of an immaterial substance, which alone is conscious, distinct and separable from the body.—2. The metaphysical doctrine that matter is the only substance, and that matter and its motions constitute the universe. See idealism, 1.

Philosophical materialism holds that matter and the motions of matter make up the sum total of existence, and that what we know as psychical phenomena in man and other animals are to be interpreted in an ultimate analysis as simply the peculiar aspect which is assumed by certain enormously complicated motions of matter. J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 277.

3. The doctrine that all phenomena are to be accounted for by the fortuitous concourse of atoms, in connection with certain laws or tendencies toward laws, in nature; Epicureanism. —4. Any opinion or tendency that is based upon purely material interests; hence, any low view of life; devotion to material things or interests; neglect of spiritual for physical needs and considerations.

Criticism is infested with a cant of materialism, which assumes that manual skill and activity is the first merit of all men, and disparages such as say and do not. Emerson, The Poet.

There is a Lower Life, of which the animating principle is secularity, or—in the popular sense of the word—materialism. J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 225.

materialist (mā-tē′ri-al-ist), n. and a. [= F. matérialiste = Sp. Pg. It. materialista; as material + -ist.] I. n. 1. One who holds or advocates any form of metaphysical materialism.

He who denies spirit in man or in the universe is a perfect materialist. Fleming, Vocab. of Philos.

2. One who is absorbed by material interests; one who takes a low, material view of life.

Persons who worship nothing but worldly success, who care for nothing but wealth, or fashionable display, or personal celebrity, or sensual gratification, are thus loosely called materialists. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., II. 433.

II. a. Of or pertaining to materialism; materialistic.

The materialist view is quite as imperfect as the spiritualist view. G. H. Lewes, Hist. Philos., II. 753.

materialistic (mā-tē″ri-a-lis′tik), a. [< materialist + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or characterized by materialism, in any sense of that word.

But to me his very spiritualism seemed more materialistic than his physics. Kingsley.

materialistical (mā-tē″ri-a-lis′ti-kal), a. [< materialistic + -al.] Same as materialistic.

materiality (mā-tē-ri-al′i-ti), n. [= F. matérialité = Sp. materialidad = Pg. materialidade = It. materialità, < NL. materialita(t-)s*, < LL. materialis, material: see material.] 1. The state or condition of being material; physical constitution or organization; corporeity: as, the old belief in the materiality of heat.

Nor had compacted earth, nor rock, nor stone,
Nor gross materiality been known.
Byrom, Epistle to a Gentleman in the Temple.

There has arisen . . . the conception of a deity who, at first human in all things, has been gradually losing human materiality. H. Spencer, Univ. Prog., p. 70.

2. A material thing; material substance.

Sufficient is it to remember for the present that the soul is a subtler and more refined materiality, which is thus endowed with more delicate and refined perceptions than the bodily organs. W. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 102.

3. Material character; coarseness; grossness.

In polygamous families . . . the children cannot avoid suffering . . . from the general debasement and materiality of life. S. Bowles, Our New West, p. 248.

4. The perception of material substance by the mind; that factor in cognition which is recognized as material.

It is of more than psychological interest to remark how the primordial factor in materiality is thus due to the projection of a subjectively determined reaction to that action of a not-self on which sense-impressions depend—an action of the not-self which, of course, is not known as such till this projection of the subjective reaction has taken place. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 56.

5. The quality of being material; importance; essentiality: as, the materiality of testimony.

Now materiality is a relative term: applied to the consequences of an act, it bore relation to pain and pleasure: applied to the circumstances, it bears relation to the consequences. Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, vii. 23.

materialization (mā-tē″ri-al-i-zā′shon), n. [< materialize + -ation.] The act of materializing or of investing with or assuming a material form; change from a spiritual, ideal, or imaginary state to a state of matter; specifically, among spiritualists, the alleged assumption by a spirit of a material or bodily form. Also spelled materialisation.

materialize (mā-tē′ri-al-īz), v.; pret. and pp. materialized, ppr. materializing. [= F. matérialiser = It. materializzare; as material + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To give a material form or bodily existence to; make physically perceptible; embody in any manner. See II.

By this means [letters] we materialize our ideas, and make them as lasting as the ink and paper, their vehicles. Guardian, No. 172.

With wonderful art and beauty [Virgil has] materialized (if I may so call it) a scheme of abstracted notions, and clothed the most nice, refined conceptions of philosophy in sensible images and poetical representations. Tatler, No. 115.

He regarded the suggestion that the letter he described as "materialised, or reintegrated in the air" was an outcome of any concealed apparatus as "grotesquely absurd." R. Hodgson, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 262.

2. To give the character of metaphysical materialism to; render materialistic.

The materializing tendencies of the former system. Milman, Hist. Latin Christianity, viii. 5.

3. To reduce to a material basis or standard; treat as pertaining only to matter; give a material character to; make material, low, coarse, sensual, etc.: as, to materialize thought, morality, or mythology; to materialize one's ideas or enjoyments.

II. intrans. 1. To become material; assume a material form; in recent spiritualistic use, to assume, as a spirit or immaterial entity, a form which is perceptible by the senses, or one that is visible, tangible, and (in the case of supposed spirits) capable of physical exertion.

But, setting aside all charlatanry, there is an overwhelming amount of evidence from people who are presumably truthful to the effect that they have actually seen persons and things materialize, as the phrase goes, out of nothing. N. A. Rev., CXLVI. 704.

2. To take form or shape; come into perceptible existence; become real: as, the project has not yet materialized. [Colloq.]

The hail of the intruders was regarded as a challenge by some fifteen or twenty hounds that suddenly materialized among the bee-hives and the althea bushes. M. N. Murfree, Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains.

Also spelled materialise.

materially (mā-tē′ri-al-i), adv. 1. With, in, by, or with reference to matter or material things; from a material point of view; physically: as, to be well provided materially; the state of the country materially considered.—2. As regards matter or substance; not formally; in itself considered.

An ill intention is certainly sufficient to spoil and corrupt an act in itself materially good. South.

3. In a material manner; to an important extent or degree; essentially.

It conduced materially to the security of good order. Hallam, Middle Ages, viii. 2.

material-man (mā-tē′ri-al-man″), n. One who keeps for sale the materials used in some trade, especially those used by builders.

materialness (mā-tē′ri-al-nes), n. The state or quality of being material; importance; essentiality.

materia medica (mā-tē′ri-ä med′i-kä). [ML. NL., medical material: materia, material, matter; medica, fem. of medicus, medical: see medic[1], medical.] 1. Medicinal agencies collectively; the various remedial substances employed in medicine.—2. That branch of medical science which treats of the various substances, natural and artificial, which are employed in the practice of medicine, and embraces an explanation of their nature and modes of action.

materiarian† (mā-tē-ri-ā′ri-an), n. [< LL. materiarius, believing in the eternity of matter, < L. materia, matter: see matter and -arian.] A materialist. Cudworth.

materiate† (mā-tē′ri-āt), a. and n. [< L. materiatus, taken, not as pp. of materiare, build of wood, but as a mere adj., made of matter, < materia, matter: see material, matter.] I. a. 1. Consisting of matter; material.

Gold, . . . the most ponderous and materiate amongst metalles. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 326.

2. In metaph., united with matter; embodied in matter: said of an Aristotelian form.

II. n. A material substance; a thing formed of matter.

materiation† (mā-tē-ri-ā′shon), n. [Cf. L. materiatio(n-), woodwork, < materiare, build of wood, materiari, procure wood: see materiate.] 1. A felling of timber for building. Cockeram.—2. In metaph., a making real by embodying in matter or visible form.

Creation, that is, a production of all things out of nothing; a formation not only of matter but of form, and a materiation even of matter itself. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 1.

materiature (mā-tē′ri-ā-tūr), n. [< materiate + -ure.] Materialization; the production by the soul of the matter of the body. J. H. Stirling.

matériel (ma-tā-ri-el′), n [F.: see material, n.] The assemblage or totality of things used or needed in carrying on any complex business or operation, in distinction from the personnel, or body of persons, employed in the same: applied more especially to military supplies and equipments, as arms, ammunition, baggage, provisions, horses, wagons, etc.

materies (mā-tē′ri-ēz), n. [L.: see matter.] In some technical uses, material; a material; a matter or substance composing or peculiar to anything, or considered as an operative or causative agency: as, materies morbi (something regarded as the immediate cause of disease).

materious† (mā-tē′ri-us), a. [< LL. materiosus, full of matter (wood?), < L. materia, matter, wood: see matter.] Same as material. Milton.

maternal (mā-tėr′nal), a. [= F. maternel = Pr. Sp. Pg. maternal = It. maternale, < L. maternus, of a mother, < mater, mother: see mater[2], mother[1].] 1. Pertaining to a mother or to motherhood; proper to a mother; motherly: as, maternal love or authority; maternal pains or cares.

Ah, that maternal smile!
Cowper, On the Receipt of my Mother's Picture.

We smile to see our little ones at play
So grave, so thoughtful, with maternal care Nursing the wisps of rags they call their babes.
O. W. Holmes, Idols.

2. Relating to or consisting of mothers; concerning the state of motherhood: as, a maternal association; a maternal hospital.—3. Coming from or through a mother; imparted by or connected with one's mother: as, a maternal inheritance; a maternal uncle or cousin; maternal ancestry or lineage.

That part alone of gross maternal frame
Fire shall devour. Gay, Apotheosis of Hercules.

Clive . . . is driven over the downs to Brighton, to his maternal aunt there. Thackeray, Newcomes, v.

4. Of or pertaining to the country of one's birth; native; vernacular.

English-speaking missionaries have planted their maternal dialect at scores of important points. G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., i.

= Syn. Parental, etc. See motherly.

maternality (mā-tėr-nal′i-ti), n. [< maternal + -ity.] Motherhood. Bailey, 1731.

maternally (mā-tėr′nal-i), adv. 1. In a maternal or motherly manner.—2. Through a mother, or on the maternal side: as, they are related maternally.

maternity (mā-ter′ni-ti), n.; pl. maternities (-tiz). [< F. maternité = Sp. maternidad = Pg. maternidade = It. maternità, < ML. maternita(t-)s, < L. maternus, of a mother: see maternal.] 1. The state of being a mother; motherhood.

Her charity was the cause of her maternity. Partheneia Sacra (1633), p. 47.

2. A place for the care of mothers in childbirth; a lying-in ward or hospital. [Rare.]

The hospital contains 65 beds, and has also a large extern maternity attached. Lancet, No. 3445, p. 509.

Extern maternity. See extern.—Maternity hospital. See hospital.

mateship (māt′ship), n. [< mate[1] + -ship.] Fellowship; companionship. [Rare.]

I sat among them equally
In fellowship and mateship, as a child.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, vii.

matfelon†, n. [Early mod. E. also materfilon; < ME. matfelon, matefelon, matfelone, mattefelon (W. madfelen, < E.), < OF. matefelon, matefelun, mateflon, knapweed.] The knapweed, Centaurea nigra; also, C. Scabiosa.

Tak avaunce, matfelon, yarow, and sanygill, and stamp tham, and temper tham with stale ale, and drynk hit morn and even. Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 53.

★mat-grass (mat′grȧs), n. 1. Same as matweed, 1. —2. A European grass, Nardus stricta, which grows abundantly on moors and heaths in short tufts. It is worthless for agricultural purposes, except as affording a natural pasturage for sheep. Also called nard.

math (măth), n. [< ME. math (?), < AS. māth (= OHG. mād, MHG. māt (mād-), G. mahd), a mowing, what is mowed, etc.; with formative -th, < māwan, mow: see mow[1].] A mowing, or what is gathered from mowing. [Obsolete, except in the compounds aftermath and latter-math.]

The first mowing thereof, for the king's use, is wont to be sooner than the common math.
Bp. Hall, Hard Texts, Amos vii.

★math. An abbreviation of mathematics and mathematical.

mathematic (math-ē-mat'ik), a. and n. [I. a. = F. mathématique = Sp. matemático = Pg. mathematico = It. matematico (cf. D. G. mathematisch = Dan. mathematisk = Sw. matematisk), < L. mathematicus, < Gr. μαθηματικός, pertaining to learning, disposed to learn, belonging to the sciences, esp. to mathematics, < μάθημα, a lesson, a thing learned, learning, science, in the pl. μαθήματα, the sciences, esp. mathematics, < μανθάνειν, μαθεῖν, learn. II. n. = F. mathématique = Sp. matemática = Pg. mathematica = It. matematica (D. mathematiek = G. Dan. mathematik = Sw. matematik), < L. mathematica, f., < Gr. μαθηματική (sc. τέχνη), f., also μαθηματικά, neut. pl., mathematics, in L. also astrology. See II.] I. a. Same as mathematical. [Rare.]

Sir, not only a mathematic point, which is the most indivisible and unique thing which art can present, flows into every line which is derived from the centre, but our soul, which is but one, hath swallowed up a negative and feeling soul. Donne, Letters, xxi.

Solving problems mathematic. Byron, Granta.

II. n. Same as mathematics. [Rare.]

All pure mathematic is thus a science of pure intuition.
Hickok, Mental Philos., p. 125.

mathematical (math-ē-mat'i-kal), a. and n. [< mathematic + -al.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or relating to mathematics; having to do with pure quantity or arrangement; quantitative: as, mathematical knowledge; mathematical instruments; a mathematical theory.

That Egyptian and Chaldean wisdom mathematical wherewith Moses and Daniel were furnished.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 8.

The greater or less accuracy attainable in a mathematical science is a matter of accident. Jevons, Pol. Econ., p. 7.

The first or mathematical class of categories, the categories of quantity or quality.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 316.

2. According to the principles of mathematics; theoretically precise; absolutely accurate; strict; rigid; demonstrable: as, mathematical exactness; mathematical certainty.

Every single argument should be managed as a mathematical demonstration.
Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 7.

3†. Geometrical, as opposed to arithmetical and algebraical: an incorrect use, formerly current.

Arithmetical, mathematical, algebraical, and paradoxical questions. R. Carlile (1794), title of book.

4†. Astrological; magical.

Though I do by the authority of God's laws and man's laws damn this damnable art mathematical, I do not damn such other arts and sciences as be associated and annexed with this unlawful astrology. Bp. Hooper, Works, I. 330.

5. Produced by mathematics, as pure figures and number.

A marveilous newtrality have these things mathematicall, and also a strange participation between things supernaturall, immortall, intellectuall, simple and indivisible, and things naturall, mortall, sensible, compounded and divisible. Dr. J. Dee, Preface to Euclid (1570).

Mathematical abstraction. See abstraction.—Mathematical body, a volume of pure space, without inertia and the other properties of natural bodies. See body.—Mathematical certainty or evidence, that sort of certainty which results from mathematical demonstration, based on a diagram or the like.—Mathematical chronology. See chronology.—Mathematical conception, a conception which is applicable immediately to space and time, and not to existence or causation; a conception that is not dynamical.—Mathematical induction. See induction, 5.—Mathematical infinity, that sort of infinity which is considered in mathematics. See infinite, 1, and infinity, 3.—Mathematical instruments, instruments for mathematical drawing and drafting, such as dividers, protractors, and the like.—Mathematical notation. See notation.—Mathematical psychology, an application of mathematics to psychology, like that attempted by Herbart.—Mathematical quantities, quantities as they are conceived by the mathematician, often professedly fictitious, as distinguished from natural quantities, which are quantities as they exist in the concrete.—Mathematical signs. See sign.—Mathematical unity, the abstract number 1.—Mathematical whole, a whole whose parts lie outside of one another; a quantitative, integral, or integrate whole.

II.† n. pl. Mathematics.

The arte of vulgar arithmeticke. . . . Newly collected, digested, and in some part devised, by a wel willer to the Mathematicals. T. Hill (1600), title of book.

Take delight likewise in the mathematicals.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 308).

The stars, the planets, and signs in the firmament shall be strange gods, if we, being deceived with the mathematicals, shall wholly hang on them. Bullinger, Sermons, ii. 2.

mathematically (math-ē-mat'i-kal-i), adv. In a mathematical manner; according to the laws or principles of mathematical science; with mathematical certainty; demonstrably: as, a proposition that is mathematically true. Prescott.

mathematician (math″ē-mā-tish'an), n. [= F. mathématicien; as mathematic + -ian.] 1. One who is versed in mathematics.

The Mathematician, taking his start from the pure perceptions of space and time, goes on freely constructing figures in space without any reference to experience, and demonstrating the properties of such figures.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 242.

2†. An astrologer.

Mathematicians, among the Romans, were for some time specially meant of astrologers, or star-prophets.
N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, p. 327.

Combinatorial mathematician. See combinatorial.

mathematicize (math-ē-mat'i-sīz), v. t. [< mathematic + -ize.] To consider or treat in a mathematical manner, as logic. [Rare.]

mathematicological (math-ē-mat″i-kō-loj'i-kal), a. Applying mathematics or algebra to logic. Jevons.

★mathematics (math-ē-mat'iks), n. [Pl. of mathematic: see -ics.] The science of quantity and arrangement; the study of ideal constructions (often applicable to real problems), and the discovery thereby of relations between the parts of these constructions, before unknown. The observations being upon objects of imagination merely, the discoveries of mathematics are susceptible of being rendered quite certain. The first considerable advances in mathematics were made by the Greeks, whose greatest geometers, Euclid, Archimedes, and Apollonius, flourished in or about the third century B. C. After their time not very much progress was made until the seventeenth century, but since then the progress of discovery has been continuous. See absolute, algebra, arithmetic, equation, function, geometry, group, infinite, infinitesimal, number, problem, quantity, space, theorem, etc.

To the pure mathematics are those sciences belonging which handle quantity determinate.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 171.

I have mentioned mathematicks as a way to settle in the mind an habit of reasoning closely and in train.
Locke, Conduct of the Understanding, § 7.

Mathematics is the science which draws necessary conclusions. B. Peirce, Linear Associative Algebra (1870), § 1.

Now this establishment of correspondence between two aggregates and investigation of the properties that are carried over by the correspondence may be called the central idea of modern mathematics.
W. K. Clifford, Philos. Pure Sciences, p. 334.

Applied mathematics, the mathematical study of a series of problems the connection of which is objective: opposed to pure mathematics, which studies systems of relations, the connection lying in the analogy of the relationship. Examples of applied mathematics are rigid dynamics, hydrodynamics, the theory of probabilities, the kinetical theory of gases, etc.—Higher mathematics, all the scientifically treated branches of mathematics—that is, all except practical arithmetic, elementary geometry, trigonometry, and a part of algebra.

mathemeg (math'ē-meg), n. [Cree mathemeg, ugly fish.] A fish of the Saskatchewan basin, believed to be the siluroid Amiurus nigricans, a kind of catfish.

mathesis (ma-thē'sis), n. [LL., learning, mathematics, < Gr. μάθησις, learning, knowledge, science, < μανθάνειν, μαθεῖν, learn: see mathematics.] 1. Mental discipline; learning or science in general, especially mathematics. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Mad Mathesis alone was unconfined, Too mad for mere material chains to bind,
Now to pure space lifts her ecstatic stare,
Now, running round the circle, finds it square.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 31.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of clerid beetles, erected by Waterhouse in 1877, having a long antennal club and the third tarsal joint not bilobed. The type is M. guttigera of New Zealand, resembling the longicorn Zorion guttigerum, with which it is associated, and upon which it is probably parasitic.

mathesy†, n. [< LL. mathesis, learning: see mathesis.] Mathesis; mathematics.

Anon after he set vp a great scole at Cauntorbury of al maner of scyences, as rhetorick, logyck, phylosophy, mathesy, astrologi, geometrye, arithmeticke, and musicke.
Bp. Bale, English Votaries, i.

mathook[1] (mat'hůk), n. In hydraul. engin., a long pole with an iron hook at the end, used in making and handling mats for jetty-work.

Lyes and libels served as spades and mathooks to work with. Roger North, Examen, p. 592.

mathook[2]†, n. A falsified form of mattock.

Mathurin (math'ū-rin), n. [So called as occupying the church of St. Mathurin in Paris.] A member of the order of Trinitarians. See Trinitarian, 2.

mati (mä'tē), n. [Chin., < ma, horse, + t'i, foot.] A sedge, Eleocharis tuberosa, growing in China, with wholesome edible tubers.

matias bark. Same as malambo bark (which see, under bark[2]).

maticin, maticine (mat'i-sin), n. [< matico[1] + -in[2], -ine[2].] A bitter principle obtained from the plant matico.

matico[1] (ma-tē'kō), n. [Sp. yerba Matico (herb of Matthew).] A plant, Piper angustifolium, belonging to the family Piperaceæ. In Peru it has long enjoyed a high reputation for styptic and aphrodisiac properties. It is an aromatic tonic and stimulant, and acts like cubebs on the urinary passages. A species of Eupatorium (E. glutinosum) has the same name.

matico[2] (mat'i-kō), n. Same as mataco.

matie (mā'ti), n. [Origin uncertain.] A fresh herring in which the roe or milt is perfectly but not largely developed. This is the state in which the fish are in the best condition for food, being most delicious as well as most nutritive. Although they are not so bulky in appearance as full herring, they are in reality much fatter. See full herring, under herring. Perley.

matin (mat'in), n. and a. [< ME. matin (in pl. matyns), < OF. and F. matin (= It. mattino), morning (matins, morning prayers), < L. matutinum, the morning, neut. of matutinus, of the morning, < Matuta, the goddess of dawn, as if fem. of an adj. matutus*, early, timely (?), akin to maturus, mature: see mature. Cf. matutine.] I. n. 1†. Morning.

The glow-worm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 89.

2. pl. One of the canonical hours appointed in the early church, and still observed in the Roman Catholic Church, especially in monastic orders. It properly begins at midnight, and is occupied by two services, nocturns and lauds. The name is also applied to the service itself, which includes the Lord's Prayer, the Angelic Salutation, the Creed, and several psalms.

The vigils are celebrated before them, and the nocturn and matins, for the saints whose the relics are.
Stillingfleet.

3. Morning worship, as sung; hence, any morning song: usually in the plural.

He ne hurde masse & matyns and eueson & eche tyde.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 369.

And crop-full out of doors he flings,
Ere the first cock his matin rings.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 114.

4. pl. A musical setting of any part of the office of matins.

II. a. Pertaining to the morning; used in the morning. [Poetical.]

Up rose the victor angels, and to arms
The matin trumpet sung. Milton, P. L., vi. 526.

Each morn my sleep was broken thro'
By some wild skylark's matin song.
Tennyson, Miller's Daughter.

matinal (mat'i-nal), a. [< F. matinal, < LL. matutinalis, of the morning, < L. matutinus, of the morning: see matin. Cf. matutinal.] 1. Relating to the morning, or to matins.—2. [cap.] Appellative of the third of Professor H. D. Rogers's subdivisions of the Paleozoic strata in the Appalachian region, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day. It represents No. III. of the numerical divisions of the Paleozoic series according to the first nomenclature of the Pennsylvania Survey, and is the equivalent of the Trenton and Hudson river series of the New York Survey.

matinée (mat-i-nā'), n. [F., < matin, morning: see matin.] 1. An entertainment (especially a theatrical performance) or a reception held in the daytime, usually in the afternoon. [The general dinner-hour of early times having been at the close of the forenoon, the French matinée, like the English morning, is often considered as extending to the common modern dinner-hour in the evening, especially in cities.] 2. A woman's dress for home wear in the forenoon, or up to the time when she dresses as for dinner or for going out. Its form and material change according to fashion.

A becoming matinee is of claret flannel. . . . Many pretty matinees are made of surah.
Philadelphia Times, March 14, 1886.

★mating (mā'ting), n. [Verbal n. of mate[1], v.] 1. The act of taking a mate, or pairing, as by birds.—2. See the quotation.

Sometimes two or more crews belonging to different vessels unite in the capture, and if successful an equitable division of the oil is afterward made. This is called mating. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 259.

mating-time (mā'ting-tīm), n. The breeding season, when any animal mates or pairs; pairing-time.

matire†, n. A Middle English form of matter.

matlockite (mat'lok-īt), n. [< Matlock (see def.) + -ite[2].] A native oxychlorid of lead, occurring near Matlock in Derbyshire, England, in tetragonal crystals of a yellowish color and adamantine luster.

matpole (mat'pōl), n. In hydraul. engin., a pole, usually about 20 feet long and 3 inches thick, smoothed and pointed with iron, used in placing mats for shore-protection, etc.

matral (mā'tral), a. [< L. matralis, pertaining to a mother, < mater, mother: see mater[2], mother[1].] In anat., pertaining to one of the membranes enveloping the brain, as the dura mater or pia mater: in composition.

Between the pia-matral and the arachnoid sheath.
H. Gray, Anat. (ed. 1887), p. 805.

Matralia (mā-trā'li-ạ), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of matralis, pertaining to a mother: see matral.] In ancient Rome, an annual festival celebrated on the eleventh of June, by the citizen matrons only, in honor of the goddess Mater Matuta.

The festival inculcated the principle that mothers should care not only for their own but for their sisters' children.

matrast†, n. [OF.: see matrass.] A crossbow-bolt. Compare vireton, quarrel[2], bolt[1].

matrass (mat'ras), n. [< F. matras, a chemical vessel so called from its long straight narrow neck, < OF. matras = Pr. matrat, an arrow, a javelin, < L. matara, mataris, materis, madaris, a Celtic javelin, a pike: a word of Celtic origin.] 1. A chemical vessel with a round or oval body and a long neck open at the top, serving the purposes of digestion, evaporation, etc.; a cucurbit. Also called bolt-head.—2†. In hort., a flask-like glass employed to shelter plants or flowers from the weather or from extremes of cold and heat.

Protect from violent storms, and the too parching darts of the sun, your pennached tulips and ranunculuses, covering them with matrasses. Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense.

matres, n. Plural of mater[2].

matresst, n. An obsolete form of mattress.

matriarch (mā'tri-ärk), n. [< L. mater, < Gr. μήτηρ, mother, + ἀρχός, a leader, ruler, < ἄρχειν, rule.] 1. The wife of a patriarch. [Rare.]

Dr. Southey has classed this injured Matriarch [Job's wife] in a triad with Xantippe and Mrs. Wesley.
Southey, The Doctor, cxvii. (Davies.)

2. A woman who holds (to some extent or in some respect) in a family or tribe a position analogous to that of a patriarch. See matriarchy.

matriarchal (mā-tri-är'kạl), a. [< matriarch + -al.] Of or pertaining to a matriarch or to matriarchy; relating to the superior importance of mothers (in certain respects, as the reckoning of descent) in a family, clan, or tribe; characterized by matriarchy.

The Indian tribes farther south are largely matriarchal, reckoning descent not on the father's but the mother's side. E. B. Tylor, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI.

Here the matriarchal system is still in existence—the eldest daughter inherits all.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 214.

matriarchalism (mā-tri-är'kạl-izm), n. [< matriarchal + -ism.] The character of being matriarchal; matriarchal customs or practices; matriarchy.

Matriarchalism has only in places yielded to the patriarchal system. E. B. Tylor, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 162.

matriarchate (mā'tri-är-kāt), n. [< matriarch + -ate[3].] The state of social organization in which the child is a member of the social division to which its mother belongs.

Women were at first considered like other properties, and in the communist stage they used to belong to each and all; when property was divided, women were assimilated to landed properties or estates, and the children took the name of their mother, as in feudal countries they took that of their estate. This is really the origin of the so-called matriarchate, in which the mother had, in fact, no power, but gave her name to her child.
Jour. Anthrop. Inst., XVIII. 271.

matriarchy (mā'tri-är-ki), n. [< L. mater, < Gr. μάτηρ, mother, + -αρχία, rule: see matriarch.] Government by a mother or by mothers; specifically, an order of society, as in certain primitive tribes, in which the mother in certain important respects, especially in line of descent and inheritance, takes precedence of the father; descent or inheritance in the female line.

The ancient Slavonians had no prejudice against matriarchy. Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 196.

Matricaria (mat-ri-kā'ri-ạ), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called with ref. to the supposed medicinal value of some of the species, < L. matrix (matric-), womb: see matrix.] A genus of plants of the family Asteraceæ and the tribe Anthemideæ. It is characterized by radiate heads, with an involucre of rather broad bracts, by achenia with from 3 to 5 ribs on the inner face and none on the back, and by a receptacle which is often conical or oblong. They are herbs, with alternate leaves, which are two or three times pinnatifid, with linear or thread-like divisions, and small or medium-sized heads, which are usually solitary at the tips of the branches, and have white ray-flowers and yellow disk-flowers. There are about 20 species, found in Europe, North America, the northern part of Asia, and southern Africa. M. Chamomilla, called wild or German camomile, is a common annual of Europe, in appearance strongly resembling the common mayweed. M. inodora, also European, is a scentless species, which, like the former, is sparingly naturalized in the United States. M. matricarioides, with rayless heads, is spreading from western America eastward, and is naturalized in northern Europe. M. glabrata, of South Africa, affords a good substitute for camomile.

Flowering Plant of Matricaria inodora.
a, ray-flower; b, disk-flower; c, achenium.

matrice† (mā'tris), n. [< F. matrice = Sp. Pg. matriz = It. matrice, < L. matrix, the womb. see matrix.] Same as matrix.

matrices, n. Plural of matrix.

matricidal (mat'ri-sī-dạl), a. [< matricide[1] + -al.] Of or pertaining to matricide, or a person guilty of matricide.

As when one fair land
Saw, North and South, her bright-armed myriads stand, Saw herself rent in twain by matricidal hand.
Palgrave, N. A. Rev., CXX. 440.

matricide[1] (mat'ri-sīd), n. [= F. matricide = Sp. Pg. It. matricida, < L. matricida, the killer of his mother, < mater, mother, + -cida, < cædere, kill.] One who kills his or her mother.

matricide[2] (mat'ri-sīd), n. [= F. matricide, < L. matricidium, the killing of one's mother, < mater, mother, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] The killing or murder of one's mother.

Thy Matricide all pardon must exceed.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, v. 17.

matricula (mā-trik'ū-lạ), n.; pl. matriculæ (-lē). [= F. matricule = Sp. matrícula = Pg. matricula = It. matricola, < LL. matricula, dim. of matrix (matric-), a public register: see matrix.] A roll or register. Specifically—(a) The register or roll of a university.

His name occurs not in the matricula.
Wood, Athenæ Oxon.

(b) In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the roll containing the names of the clergy permanently attached to a cathedral, a collegiate, or a parish church.

matriculant (mā-trik'ū-lạnt), n. [< ML. matriculan(t-)s, ppr. of matriculare, register: see matriculate.] A candidate for matriculation; one who applies for enrolment among the members of a body, as a student in a college or university; an entrant.

They are ready to favor the demand upon matriculants for a preliminary qualification. The American, V. 390.

matriculate (mā-trik'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. matriculated, ppr. matriculating. [< ML. matriculatus, pp. of matriculare (> It. matricolare = Sp. Pg. matricular), register, enroll, < LL. matricula, a public register, roll, list, dim. of matrix, a public register: see matricula, matrix.] I. trans. To enter in a register; register; enroll; especially, to enter or admit to membership in a body or society, particularly in a college or university, by enrolling one's name in a register.

It was their obstinacy to incorporate their errors into their creeds, and to matriculate their abuses among their sacred rites.
Abp. Bramhall, Works, II. 206, quoted in Wordsworth's [Church of Ireland, II. 221.

Frederick was, accordingly, at the proper age, matriculated at Oxford. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 179.

II. intrans. To become a member of any body or society, especially a college or university, by having one's name entered in a register.

The Browns have become illustrious by the pen of Thackeray and the pencil of Doyle, within the memory of the young gentlemen who are now matriculating at the universities. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 1.

matriculate (mā-trik'ū-lāt), a. and n. [< ML. matriculatus, pp.: see the verb.] I. a. Matriculated; admitted; enrolled.

To be matriculate with ladies of estate.
Skelton, Garland of Laurell.

II. n. One who has been admitted to membership of a body, as a college or university, by enrolment in its register.

Suffer me in the name of the matriculates of that famous university to ask them some plain questions. Arbuthnot.

matriculation (mā-trik-ū-lā'shọn), n. [= Sp. matriculación, < ML. matriculatio(n-)*, < matriculare, register: see matriculate.] The act of matriculating, or of admitting to membership by enrolment; the state of being matriculated.

A scholar absent from the university for five years is struck out of the matriculation book. Ayliffe, Parergon.

matriculator (mā-trik'ū-lā-tọr), n. [< ML. matriculator*, < matriculare, register: see matriculate.] One who matriculates.

At Oxford the matriculator subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles, and also swore to observe three articles of the 36th Canon. Quarterly Rev., CXLVI. 209.

matriheritage (mat-ri-her'i-tāj), n. [< L. mater (matr-), mother, + E. heritage.] Inheritance in the female line of descent.

The two systems of matriheritage and polyandry.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 141.

matriherital (mat-ri-her'i-tạl), a. [< L. mater (matr-), mother, + herit(age) + -al.] Of or pertaining to matriheritage, or inheritance in the female line.

An excellent specimen of the matriarchal or matriherital system fully carried out under recognized and well-defined law among a civilized people. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXX. 141.

matrimoignet, n. A Middle English form of matrimony. Chaucer.

matrimonial (mat-ri-mō'ni-ạl), a. [= F. matrimonial = Sp. Pg. matrimonial = It. matrimoniale, < LL. matrimonialis, pertaining to marriage, < L. matrimonium, marriage: see matrimony.] 1. Of or pertaining to matrimony; connubial; nuptial: as, matrimonial rights or duties.

Cherish thy hasten'd widowhood with the gold
Of matrimonial treason! Milton, S. A., l. 959.

The main article in matrimonial alliances.
Paley, Moral Philos., iii. 8.

2. Derived from marriage.

If he [Henry VII.] relied upon that title, he could be but a king at courtesy, and have rather a matrimonial than a regal power. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

Crown matrimonial, in Scot. hist., the right to a share in the sovereignty conferred on the husband of a reigning queen. The extent of this concession appears never to have been precisely defined; but the common belief is that it implied a complete partnership in the crown, with remainder to the survivor and his or her heirs. It was granted, with important reservations, on the occasion of the first marriage of Mary Queen of Scots, and was explicitly refused to her second husband.—Matrimonial cause, in law, a suit for the redress of injuries respecting the rights of marriage, as an action for divorce or the like. In England such causes were formerly a branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.—Matrimonial Causes Acts, a series of English statutes relating to causes arising from the matrimonial relation. (a) A statute of 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 85) which established the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, having exclusive jurisdiction over divorce and matrimonial matters, and settled the law relating thereto. (b) A statute of 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 19) relating to divorce and judicial separation. (c) A statute of 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., c. 68) which substitutes for the restitution of conjugal rights formerly enforced periodical payments of money by the husband, authorizes the court to order a settlement of a wife's property for the benefit of the husband and children, and relates to desertion and custody of children.—Syn. 1. Matrimonial, Connubial, Nuptial, Conjugal, Hymeneal, Marital. Matrimonial, connubial, and conjugal, like matrimony, relate to the married state. Nuptial and hymeneal are more suggestive of the act of marriage or that which is in close connection with it. Connubial suggests the fact that marriage is the union of persons of opposite sexes. Conjugal primarily means belonging to a spouse, and secondarily belonging to the state of spouses—that is, matrimony: as, conjugal felicity, responsibility, obligations, rights. Marital means, specifically, belonging to a husband, but is also used with reference to the married state in general.

matrimonially (mat-ri-mō'ni-ạl-i), adv. As regards matrimony; in matrimony; according to the manner or laws of marriage.

He is so matrimonially wedded unto his church that he cannot quit the same. Ayliffe, Parergon.

matrimoniousf (mat-ri-mō'ni-us), a. [< matrimony + -ous.] Relating to matrimony; matrimonial.

Foreseeing the miserable work that man's ignorance and pusillanimity would make in this matrimonious business. Milton, Tetrachordon.

matrimony (mat'ri-mọ-ni), n. [< ME. matrimonye, also matrimoyne, matrimoigne, < OF. matrimoine, matrimonie = Pr. matrimoni = Sp. Pg. It. matrimonio, < L. matrimonium, marriage, wedlock, in pl. wives; < mater (matri-), mother (see mater[2], mother[1]), + term. -monium: see -mony.] 1. The relation of husband and wife, with especial reference to what concerns the latter; the state of marriage or wedlock; nuptial union; conjugal partnership.

He that joyneth his virgin in matrymonye doith wel. Wyclif, 1 Cor. vii. 38.

2. The act of marriage; entrance upon the married state by a formal ceremony or procedure: as, the solemnization of matrimony by a clergyman. In the Roman Catholic Church matrimony is regarded as one of the sacraments.

Exhorting the married men to temperance, and the bachelors to matrimony. Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

3†. Wife. [A Latinism. Compare wedlock in the same sense.]

Restore my matrimony undefil'd,
Wrong not my niece, and, for our gold or silver
If I pursue you, hang me!
Beau. and Fl., Little French Lawyer, iv. 6.

4. A game with cards. = Syn. 1 and 2. Wedlock, Wedding, etc. See marriage.

matrimony-vine (mat'ri-mō-ni-vīn), n. A garden-plant, Lycium vulgare; also, the closely allied L. barbarum. The latter is said to be used in medicine in Japan.

matrimoyne†, n. A Middle English form of matrimony.

matrix (mā'triks or mat'riks), n.; pl. matrices (mat'ri-sēz, L. mā-trī'sēz). [< L. matrix (matric-), a breeding animal, the parent stem (of plants), LL. the womb, a source, origin, cause, a public register or roll, < mater (= Gr. μήτηρ), mother: see *mater*², *mother*¹.] 1. The womb; the uterus.

All that openeth the matrix is mine. Ex. xxxiv. 19.

Hence—2. That which incloses anything, or gives origin to anything, like a womb. (a) A mold which gives form to material forced into it in a solid condition, or poured into it in a fluid state and allowed to harden before removal. (b) In coining, the intaglio formed in steel by engraving, or by driving into the metal a tool called a hub, upon which the design of the coin has been produced in relief. The steel matrix is subsequently hardened and tempered. From this matrix punches for making dies are obtained by driving into it pieces of soft steel, which, after taking form from the matrix, are in their turn hardened and tempered. The instruments used in coining thus alternately take the design in cameo and intaglio, and in order as follows: (1) cameo, the hub; (2) intaglio, the matrix; (3) cameo, the punch; (4) intaglio, the die. Lastly the coin is struck in cameo by the die. (c) The bottom die in any stamping- or drop-press. (d) In type-founding, an attachment to the mold in which the face of a type is cast, the mold proper making the body for that face. Every letter or character has its special matrix, but all the matrices of the same font are fitted to one mold. The matrix is a small flat bar of copper that has received the deeply sunken impress of the punch, or model letter cut on a rod of steel. As left by the punch it is known as a drive, or strike, or unjustified matrix. When finished and fitted to the mold it is a justified matrix. Matrices are also made by the electrotyping process. (e) In stereotyping, the mold of plaster, papier maché, or other composition which is taken from types as arranged in the form, and into which the melted alloy called stereotypers' metal is poured in casting stereotype-plates. (f) In mineral. and geol., the rock in which any accidental crystal, mineral, or fossil is embedded. (g) In mining, same as gangue, 1. [Rare and incorrect.] (h) In odontog., the formative part of a mammalian tooth, consisting of a pulp and capsule. The former is converted into dentine, the latter into cement. (i) In anat., the intercellular substance: as, the matrix of cartilage, containing corpuscles; the animal matrix of bone, impregnated with mineral salts, etc. (j) In bot.: (1) That upon which a plant is fixed or from which it grows: as, lichens which grow upon a matrix of rock. (2) Intercellular substance: as, the filaments of nostoc lie in a gelatinous matrix.

3. In math., a rectangular array, usually square: so called when considered as a mold or set of compartments into which a certain number of quantities can be put, the leaving of one of the spaces unoccupied being in effect to put zero there. The matrix is consequently a multiple quantity having as many dimensions as it has spaces. The numbers in the spaces are called the elements of the matrix. The following definitions relate to square matrices. The vertical lines of numbers are called the columns, the horizontal ones the rows. The diagonal running from the upper left-hand to the lower right-hand corner is called the principal diagonal. Elements symmetrically situated with reference to the principal diagonal are said to be conjugate. A matrix in which every element is equal to its conjugate is said to be symmetrical; if all the elements along each diagonal band transverse to the principal diagonal are equal, the matrix is said to be persymmetrical. The addition of matrices is so understood that the sum of two like matrices is a matrix every element of which is equal to the sum of the corresponding elements of the parts. The multiplication of two like square matrices is so understood that the product is a matrix whose construction is of the kind shown in the following example:

$$\begin{Vmatrix} a, b \\ c, d \end{Vmatrix} \times \begin{Vmatrix} A, B \\ C, D \end{Vmatrix} = \begin{Vmatrix} aA + bC, aB + bD \\ cA + dC, cB + dD \end{Vmatrix}$$

Inverse matrix to a given matrix, the matrix of transformation from the set of variables to which the direct matrix transforms to the set from which it transforms. Also called reciprocal matrix.—Invertebrate matrix, a square matrix whose principal diagonal contains zeros.—Latent roots of a matrix. See latent.—Matrix of the type $q \times p$, a matrix with p columns and q rows. The types of two matrices are said to be complementary when $p - p^1 = q + q^1$.—Matrix-rolling machine, in stereotyping by the paper process, a machine sometimes used, in place of the beating-table and brush, to force the type into the prepared paper.—Nuclear matrix. See karyoplasm.—Reciprocal matrix. See inverse matrix.

matron (mā'trọn or mat'rọn), n. [< F. matrone = Sp. Pg. It. matrona, < L. matrona, a married woman, wife, matron, < mater, mother: see *mater*², *mother*¹.] 1. A married woman, especially an elderly married woman, or a woman old enough to be the mother of a family, whether actually so or not; a woman possessing the gravity suitable to a mother.

Yet did that auncient matrone all she might
To cherish her with all things choice and rare.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. xii. 14.

For thee the soldier bleeds, the matron mourns.
Pope, Iliad, vi. 412.

2. In a special sense, a head nurse in a hospital; the female head or superintendent of any institution.—Jury of matrons. See jury.

matronage (mat'rọn-āj or mā'trọn-āj), n. [< matron + -age.] 1. The state of being a matron; matronly character or condition.

The underscorings of young ladies' letters, a wonder even to themselves under the colder north-light of matronage. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 120.

2. A body of matrons; matrons collectively.

His exemplary queen at the head of the matronage of this land. Burke, A Regicide Peace, i.

matronal (mā'trọn-al or mat'rọn-al), a. [= Sp. Pg. matronal = It. matronale, < L. matronalis, of or belonging to a married woman, < matrona, a married woman: see matron.] Of or pertaining to a matron; suitable to an elderly lady or to a married woman; grave; motherly.

He had herd of the beautie and vertuous behaviour of the young Queen of Naples, the widdow of Ferdinando the younger, being then of matronall yeares of seuen and twentie. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 218.

Only, in depicting this Roman ideal of matronal chastity, Fletcher, with his wonted coarseness of taste, has touched on very slippery ground. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 337.

Matronalia (mat-rō-nā'li-ą), n. pl. [L., orig. neut. pl. of matronalis, belonging to a married woman: see matronal.] In Rom. antiq., a festival celebrated by matrons on the first of March in honor of Mars.

matronhood (mā'trọn-hụd or mat'rọn-hụd), n. [< matron + -hood.] The condition of being a matron; matronage.

matronize (mā'trọn-īz or mat'rọn-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. matronized, ppr. matronizing. [< matron + -ize.] 1. To render matronly.

Childbed matronizes the giddiest spirits.
Richardson, Familiar Letters.

2. To act as a mother to; assume the manner of a matron toward; specifically, to chaperon.

She . . . brought her to Boston to matronize her.
Howells, Modern Instance, xxi.

Also spelled matronise.

matronlike (mā'trọn-līk or mat'rọn-līk), a. Matronly.

matronly (mā'trọn-li or mat'rọn-li), a. [< matron + *-ly*¹.] Like a matron; characteristic of or suitable to a matron; elderly; ripe in years.

The matronly wife plucked out all the brown hairs, and the younger the white. Sir R. L'Estrange, Fables.

matronly (mā'trọn-li or mat'rọn-li), adv. [< matronly, a.] In a manner becoming a matron. [Rare.]

She up arose with seemely grace,
And toward them full matronely did pace.
Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 8.

matronship (mā'trọn-ship or mat'rọn-ship), n. [< matron + -ship.] The office of matron of a hospital or other institution. Lancet, No. 3422, p. 62 of Adv't's.

matronymic (mat-rō-nim'ik), a. and n. [= It. matronimico, < L. mater, Gr. μήτηρ, mother, + Gr. ὄνυμα, ὄνομα, name.] I. a. Pertaining to or being a name derived from a mother or maternal ancestor.

II. n. 1. A name derived from a mother or maternal ancestor: correlative to patronymic.

If it be a clear sign of exclusive female kinship that children should take the mother's family name, it is, a fortiori, a note of it that they should be called by a matronymic. J. F. M'Lennan, Studies in Anc. Hist., p. 289.

2. A word of a form used for matronymic designation; a matronymic formation.

A genitive and possessive casal suffix, variant of -al, which was used as a matronymic.
The Academy, Jan. 14, 1888, p. 29.

matross (ma-tros'), n. [= G. matrose, < D. matroos = Sw. Dan. matros, a sailor, irreg. < F. matelot, a sailor, seaman, a corruption of matenot*, < Icel. mötunautr, messmate, companion, < matr (= E. meat) + nautr = AS. geneát, companion (see geneat).] Formerly, one of the soldiers in a train of artillery who were next to the gunners, and assisted them in loading, firing, and sponging the guns. They carried firelocks, and marched with the store-wagons as guards and assistants.

matsu (mats), n. [Jap. matsŭ, pine.] The most common tree of Japan, a pine which attains great age and size, Pinus Massoniana. It is a fine tree for avenues, and its wood is valuable for house-carpentry and furniture.

matt, a., n., and v. See *mat*³.

mattachin†, n. See matachin.

mattagess†, mattagesse†, n. See matagasse.

mattamore (mat'a-mōr), n. [< F. matamore, < Ar. metmur, a ditch, a cavern or other subterranean place in which corn is laid up.] In the East, a subterranean repository for wheat.

matte (mat), n. [F., < G. matt, dull, dim: see *mat*³.] In metal., a product of the smelting of sulphureted ores, obtained in the process which next follows the roasting. The object of this process is to remove the oxid of iron present in the roasted ore, by causing it to combine with silica, with which it forms a fusible slag. Also called regulus and coarse metal.

In English copper-works the word metal is commonly used to denote compounds of this kind, that of regulus being applied in a specific sense to certain kinds of metal. I shall, however, adopt the word regulus as a generic appellation for such products. The Germans designate regulus by the synonymous terms Stein and Lech, and the French by the term matte. Percy's Metallurgy, I. 44.

matted (mat'ed), p. a. [< *mat*¹ + *-ed*².] Covered with mats or matting. [Rare.]

If the matted things fright you on the same account [the danger of fire], the coverings may be taken off, and laid by in some dry place. Gray, Letters, I. 388.

★matter (mat'ėr), n. [< ME. matter, mattere, mater, matere, < OF. matiere, matere, matire = F. matière = Sp. Pg. It. materia = D. G. Dan. materie = Sw. materia, matter (= vernacular Sp. madera = Pg. madeira, wood, > ult. E. Madeira), < L. materia, also materies, stuff, matter of which anything is composed, wood, timber, etc., lit. 'material of which anything is formed or made'; with formative -ter, from the root ma, Skt. √ mā, form, build, make, arrange, same as √ mā, measure: see *mete*¹. Cf. L. mater, mother, manus, hand, usually referred to the same root: see *mother*¹, *main*³.] 1. Sensible substance; that which offers resistance to touch or muscular effort; that which can be moved, strained, broken, comminuted, or otherwise modified, but which cannot be destroyed or produced; that which reacts against forces, is permanent, and preserves its identity under all changes. Matter has three states of aggregation, the solid, the liquid, and the gaseous. See solid, liquid, gas, and *ether*¹.

One and the same quantity of matter remains invariable in nature, without addition or diminution.
Bacon, Physical Fables, i., Expl.

Matter being a divisible substance, consisting always of separable, nay of actually separate and distinct parts, 'tis plain that, unless it were essentially conscious, in which case every particle of matter must consist of innumerable, separate, and distinct consciousnesses, no system of it in any possible composition or division can be any individual conscious being. Clarke, To Mr. Dodwell.

According to the definition I have proposed, Matter, and the changes of Matter, mean the Felt, and the changes of the Felt; and all our knowledge of Matter is in Feeling, and the changes of Feeling.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. iv. § 88.

All that we know about matter is that it is the hypothetical substance of physical phenomena.
Huxley, Sensation and Sensiferous Organs.

2. In philos.: (a) That which is in itself nothing definite, but is the subject of change and development, and by receiving a form becomes a substance; that out of which anything is made. See form. Matter in this sense (a translation of Aristotle's word ὕλη, originally wood) is termed by the scholastics matter ex qua (out of which), to distinguish it from matter circum quam (concerning which), or the object of any action or power, as well as from matter in qua (in which), or the subject of any attribute.

Generally matter is divided into that out of which, in which, and about which: that out of which is that which is properly so called; in which the subject; about which the object. Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Matter unform'd and void. Milton, P. L., vii. 233.

(b) Extended substance. Descartes. (c) In the Kantian terminology, that which receives forms; especially, that element of cognition which comes to us from without; that which distinguishes a particular cognition from others; the purely sensuous part, independent of the representations of space and time and of every operation of thought; the content of experience.

All the matter of perception is but our own affection.
J. Hutchinson Stirling, Mind, X. 63.

3. That of which anything is or may be composed; plastic, formative, or formed material of any kind; material: as, the prime matters of textile fabrics (wool, cotton, silk, etc.); the book contains much useless matter.

Perpetueel matere of the fir of helle.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

The upper regions of the air receive the collection of the matter of tempests before the air here below. Bacon.

A goodly monument, which the Great Mogor hath beene nine yeares in building. . . . The matter is fine Marble, the forme nine square, two English miles about, and nine stories in height. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 478.

Fancy and judgment are a play's full matter.
Ford, Fancies, Epil.

That other mortal . . .
Whom of our matter time shall mould anew.
Dryden, tr. of Lucretius, iii. 30.

4. Specifically, in printing: (a) Material for work; copy: as, to keep the compositors supplied with matter. (b) Type set up; material to be printed from, or that has been printed from and will not again be required: in the former case called distinctively live matter, and in the latter dead matter.—5. In a restricted sense, mere effete substance; that which is thrown off by a living body, or which collects in it as the result of disease; pus: as, fecal matter; purulent or suppurative matter (often called simply matter); the discharge of matter from an abscess or a wound.—6. The material of thought or expression; the substance of a mental act or a course of thought; something existing in or brought forth by the mind; a conception or a production of the intellect considered as to its contents or significance, as distinguished from its form.

I will answer also my part, . . . for I am full of matter.
Job xxxii. 17, 18.

Conceit, more rich in matter than in words,
Brags of his substance, not of ornament.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 6. 30.

Euery man's stile is for the most part according to the matter and subiect of the writer, or so ought to be, and conformable thereunto.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 124.

I know no man a greater master in commanding words to serve matter.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, Pref., p. x.

Upon this theme his discourse is long, his matter little but repetition. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xiiii.

His manner in court was excelled by his matter.
Sumner, Hon. John Pickering.

7. Material or occasion for thought, feeling, or expression; a subject or cause of mental operation or manifestation; intellectual basis or ground; theme; topic; source: as, matter for reflection; a matter of joy or grief.

Thurgh vnwarnes of wit that thi wirdis cast, Thow ges matir to men mony day after,
fforto speke of thi spede, & with spell herkyn
Of thi lure and thi losse for a high wille.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 2089.

It is made but a laughing matter, but a trifle; but it is a sad matter, and an earnest matter.
Latimer, Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Hail, Son of God! Saviour of men! Thy name
Shall be the copious matter of my song.
Milton, P. L., iii. 413.

The wavering and cowardly policy of England furnished matter of ridicule to all the nations of Europe.
Macaulay, Bacon.

8. A subject of or for consideration or action; something requiring attention or effort; material for activity; affair; concern: as, matters of state or of business.

Ye now wolde vs meve with other materes and tales other weyes, and ther-fore we pray you and requyre speke no more ther-of. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 581.

For their priuate matters they can follow, fawne, and flatter noble Personages. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 83.

To your quick-conceiving discontents,
I'll read you matter deep and dangerous.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 190.

I have matter of danger and state to impart to Cæsar.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

High matter thou enjoin'st me, O prime of men!
Sad task and hard. Milton, P. L., v. 563.

She knows but matters of the house.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xcvii.

9. A subject of debate or controversy; a question under discussion; a ground of difference or dispute.

Every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge. Ex. xviii. 22.

Dare any one of you, having a matter against another, go to law? 1 Cor. vi. 1.

[They brought] divers arguments against it, whereof some were weighty, but not to the matter.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 154.

Adr. Why, man, what is the matter?
Dro. S. I do not know the matter: he's rested on the case.
Shak., C. of E., iv. 2. 42.

A fawn was reasoning the matter with a stag, why he should run away from the dogs. Sir R. L'Estrange.

The word matter has always meant, in legal proceedings, the question in controversy.
Davis, Law in Shakspeare, p. 134.

10. An object of thought in general; a thing engaging the attention; anything under consideration indefinitely: as, that is a matter of no moment; a matter of fact.

For they speak not peace: but they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land. Ps. xxxv. 20.

My heart is inditing a good matter. Ps. xlv. 1.

What impossible matter will he make easy next?
Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 88.

Matters succeeded so well with him, that everybody was in admiration to see how mighty rich he was grown.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

With many thousand matters left to do.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

Money matters seem likely to go on capitally. My expenses, I find, will be smaller than I anticipated.
Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 331.

And the power of creation is not a matter of static ability; it is a matter of habits and desires.
W. K. Clifford, Mental Development, p. 104.

11. A circumstance or condition as affecting persons or things; a state of things; especially, something requiring remedy, adjustment, or explanation: as, this is a serious matter; what is the matter?

"It's a very strange matter, fair maiden," said he, . . .
"I canna' blaw my horn, but ye call on me."
Lady Isabel and the Elf-Knight (Child's Ballads, I. 196).

Then go with me to make the matter good.
Shak., T. of the S., iv. 2. 114.

I'll tell you what the matter is with you.
Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, i. 21.

So when you plague a fool, 'tis still the curse,
You only make the matter worse and worse.
Pope, Donne Versified, Sat. iv.

What has been the matter?—you were denied to me at first! Sheridan, The Rivals, i. 21.

12†. An inducing cause or occasion; explanatory fact or circumstance; reason.

The matter of seditions is of two kinds: much poverty and much discontent. Bacon, Seditions and Troubles.

And this is the matter why interpreters . . . will not consent it to be a true story. Milton.

13. Significance; sense; meaning; import.

I was born to speak all mirth and no matter.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 344.

14. Ground of consideration; importance; consequence: used especially in interrogative and negative phrases, sometimes with an ellipsis of the verb.

Whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me.
Gal. ii. 6.

Much matter was made of this, as fearing it would be taken as an act of rebellion.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 175.

Steele, Spectator, No. 6.

If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter [is it], soon or late, or here or there?
Pope, Essay on Man, i. 74.

Mr. Surface, what news do you hear? though indeed it is no matter, for I think one hears nothing else but scandal. Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

15. Something indefinite as to amount or quantity; a measure, distance, time, or the like, approximately or vaguely stated.

One of his pinnaces was about forty tons, of cedar, built at Barbathes, and brought to Virginia by Capt. Powell, who there dying, she was sold for a small matter.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 228.

Away he goes to the market-town, a matter of seven miles off. Sir R. L'Estrange.

The Dutch, as I have before observ'd, do often buy Proebottoms for a small matter of the Maylayans.
Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 111.

I have Thoughts to tarry a small matter in Town, to learn somewhat of your Lingo first, before I cross the Seas.
Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 15.

16. In law: (a) Statement or allegation: as, the court may strike out scandalous matter from a pleading. (b) A proceeding of a special nature, commenced by motion on petition or order to show cause, etc., as distinguished from a formal action by one party against another, commenced by process and seeking judgment: as, the matter of the application of A. B. for the appointment of a trustee.—17†. Wood: apparently with reference to the hard stem of the vine.

Helpe hem uppe with canne and litel stakes,
And yeve hem streng yeres after three.
At yeres IIII uppe III matiers takes On hem, alle ronk yf that the landes be.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 72.

Abstraction from singulars but not from matter. See abstraction.—All is a matter†, it is all one thing substantially; hence, it is wholly indifferent.

Whether we make the common readers to laugh or to lowre, all is a matter. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 86.

A matter of course. See course[1].—A matter of life and death. See life.—Close matter. See close[2].—Coloring matter. See color.—Common matter†, that which all things have in common; being.—Contingent matter. See contingent.—Dead matter. See def. 4 (b).—First matter†. (a) In metaph., matter unformed and chaotic. (b) The material or substance of which anything is composed. Also prime matter, materia prima.—For that matter, as far as that goes; so far as that is concerned.

For that Matter, Sir, be ye 'Squire, Knight, or Lord, I'll give you whate'er a good Inn can afford.
Prior, Down-Hall, st. 21.

Intelligible matter. See intelligible.—Live matter. See def. 4 (b).—Matter of a proposition, the subject of the proposition: also called the material matter, in contradistinction to the formal matter, which is the fact signified.—Matter of a syllogism, the propositions and terms of the syllogism. The formal matter of a proposition has, since the twelfth century, been distinguished as natural, contingent or casual, and remote or unnatural, according as the character signified by the predicate term must, may or may not, or cannot, inhere in the subject.—Matter of cognition. See def. 2 (c).—Matter of composition, or permanent matter, that of which anything consists.—Matter of fact. (a) A reality, as distinguished from what is fanciful, hypothetical, or hyperbolical.

Lady Sneer. Strange, indeed!
Crabt. Matter of fact, I assure you.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

(b) In law, that which is fact or alleged as fact: in contradistinction to matter of law, which consists in the resulting relations, rights, and obligations which the law establishes in view of given facts. Thus, the questions whether a man executed a contract, and whether he was intoxicated at the time, relate to matters of fact; whether, if so, he is bound by the contract, and what the instrument means, are matters of law. The importance of the distinction is that in pleading allegations of the former are essential and of the latter unavailing, and that the former are usually questions for the jury, the latter for the judge. (c) A particular element or fact of experience.

Some particular existence, or, as it is usually termed, matter-of-fact. Locke, Human Understanding, IV. xvi. 5.

What is the nature of that evidence which assures us of any real existence and matter of fact, beyond the present testimony of our senses?
Hume, Human Understanding, iv.

Matter of generation, or transient matter, that out of which anything is made, as seed.—Matter of law. See matter of fact (b).—Matter of record, that which is recorded, or which may be proved by record. In law the term imports a judicial, or at least an official, record. See record.—Second matter, in metaph., matter formed. See first matter.—Sensible matter, the matter of sensible things.—Signate, designate, determinate, or individual matter, that which is diverse, though not in any character different, in all individuals. This distinction originated with Thomas Aquinas.—Spiritual matter, the matter of the incorruptible body after the resurrection.—Standing matter, composed types that have not yet been printed or molded from, or that have been so used and are set aside for further service.—To make a matter of conscience. See conscience.—To make matter†, to make no matter. See make[1].—Upon the matter†, upon the whole matter, on the whole; taking all things into view.

So that upon the matter, in a great wit, deformity is an advantage to rising. Bacon, Deformity.

Waller, with Sir William Balfour, exceeded in horse, but were, upon the whole matter, equal in foot. Clarendon.

What's the matter with (a thing or act)? what is your objection to (it)?—a humorous use, at once assuming that objection has been made, implying that there is no ground for the objection, and recommending the thing or act mentioned.

matter (mat'ėr), v. [< matter, n.] I. intrans. 1. To be of importance; import; signify: chiefly used in negative and interrogative phrases: as, it does not matter; what does it matter?

For Sosianus and Sagitta were men vile and of no account, neither mattered it where they liued.
Sir H. Savile, tr. of Tacitus, p. 161.

To a man of virtue and honour, indeed, this mattered little. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xvii.

2†. To form pus; collect or be discharged, as matter in an abscess; also, to discharge pus.

Each slight sore mattereth. Sir P. Sidney.

Earth's milk 's a ripened core,
That drops from her disease, that matters from her sore.
Quarles, Emblems, i. 12.

II. trans. 1†. To regard; care for; mind.

I repulsed her once and again; but she put by my repulses, and smiled. Then I began to be angry; but she mattered that nothing at all.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 339.

The low Land is sometimes overflown with water in the time of Harvest, yet they matter it not, but gather the crop and fetch it home wet in their Canoas.
Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 25.

I had rather receive Money than Letters. I don't matter Letters, so the Money does but come.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 106.

2. To approve of. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

matterful (mat'ėr-fûl), a. [< matter + -ful.] Full of matter, substance, good sense, or the like; pithy; pregnant.

What a sweet, unpretending, pretty-mannered, matterful creature! Lamb, To Wordsworth (1815), p. 97.

matterless (mat'ėr-les), a. [< matter + -less.] Void of matter, substance, or significance; immaterial, either literally or figuratively; of no consequence or importance.

All fine noise
Of verse, meere matterlesse and tinkling toies.
B. Jonson, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry.

Like shades . . . quite matterlesse.
Davies, Wittes Pilgrimage, p. 35. (Davies.)

The sky is only the matterless limit of vision.
Boardman, Creative Week, p. 84.

matter-of-course (mat'ėr-ọv-kōrs'), a. Proceeding as a natural consequence; following naturally as a thing to be expected or about which there can be no question.

I won't have that sort of matter-of-course acquiescence.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, xxx.

matter-of-fact (mat'ėr-ọv-fakt'), a. 1. Consisting of or pertaining to facts; not fanciful, imaginative, or ideal; ordinary; commonplace: applied to things.

His passion for matter-of-fact narrative sometimes betrayed him into a long relation of common incidents.
Lamb, To Wilson.

The common matter-of-fact world of sense and sight.
Caird.

The man said good morning, in a matter-of-fact way.
The Century, XXXVI. 823.

2. Adhering to facts; not given to wander beyond realities; unimaginative; prosaic: applied to persons.

One of our company, a doctor of divinity, and a plain matter-of-fact man. Boswell, Johnson.

mattery (mat'ėr-i), a. [< matter + -y[1].] 1. Full of matter — that is, of thought or facts; significant; weighty. [Rare.]

Away with your mattery sentences, Momus; they are too grave and wise for this meeting.
B. Jonson, Poetaster, iv. 3.

2. Purulent; generating pus. [Rare.]

The putrid vapours colliquate the phlegmatick humours of the body, which, transcending to the lungs, causes their mattery cough. Harvey, Consumptions. (Latham.)

Matthieu-Plessy green. See green[1].

Matthiola (mat-thī'ō-lä), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1812), named after P. A. Mattioli, an Italian physician of the 16th century.] An untenable name for Gackenia, a genus of cruciferous plants, characterized by a long many-seeded silique, and stigmas often thickened or horned at the back. They are hoary herbs or low branching shrubs, with oblong or linear leaves, which are entire or sinuate, and with rather large flowers, usually purple or white and growing in bractless racemes. There are about 36 species, natives of Europe, the Mediterranean region, and western Asia. To this genus belong the numberless varieties of stock or stock-gillyflower of the gardens. Gackenia incana includes the biennial sorts, the Brompton stock, queen stock, and others. It is wild along the Mediterranean coast-line, etc. (See gillyflower, 3, and hopes.) Gackenia annua, of southern Europe, furnishes the ten-week stocks. The smooth-leafed or wallflower-leafed stock is a form of G. incana. G. tristis (Cheiranthus tristis of Linnæus), of southern Europe, is the dark-flowered or night-scented stock, with lurid flowers pleasantly fragrant in the evening.

mattie (mat'i), n. Same as matie.

matting[1] (mat'ing), n. [Verbal n. of mat[1], v.] 1. Materials for mats; matwork.—2. A fabric of some coarse material, as rushes, flags, grass, straw, hemp, bamboo, etc., used for covering floors, as a packing for some kinds of goods, and for various other purposes.

All around us, what powers are wrapped up under the coarse mattings of custom, and all wonder prevented.
Emerson, New England Reformers.

3. Naut., a texture made of strands of old rope, or of spun-yarn, beaten flat and interwoven, used to prevent chafing.—4. The mat of a picture.—Canton matting. Same as India matting.—Cocoanut matting, matting made of coir, especially that which is heavy and thick and rather open in texture. It is used especially for floor-covering in places where much wear is expected.—Grass matting, matting made of vegetable fiber, of which many sorts are utilized in India, China, and Japan. It is used principally for floor-cloth.—India matting. See India.—Indian-matting plant, a kind of sedge, Cyperus tegetum, native in India. It is largely employed in the manufacture of matting.—Russia matting, a coarse woven fabric for packing, made ★ in Russia from strips of the bast or inner bark of the linden.

matting[2] (mat'ing), n. [Verbal n. of mat[3], v.] 1. The act or process of producing a dull or roughened surface on metal; specifically, the process of covering plates with varnish in gilding on water-size. E. H. Knight.—2. A dull, slightly roughened surface, free from polish, produced by the use of the mat.

matting-boat (mat'ing-bōt), n. Same as mat-boat.

matting-loom (mat'ing-löm), n. A loom in which slats are introduced into the shed to form the woof. E. H. Knight.

matting-punch (mat'ing-punch), n. In metal-working, a punch with a roughened working end, used with a light hammer or mallet for matting the ground or the parts of the surface left flat between fretwork tracery, etc. For very fine work in silver or gold such punches are sometimes made by breaking with a sharp blow a bar of highly hardened steel, and selecting pieces which have one even, finely and regularly granulated end, and so grinding the other as to remove the angles. The unground end is the working end of the punch, and needs no further preparation.

matting-tool (mat'ing-tōl), n. In metal-working, a kind of chasing-tool for producing evenly roughened surfaces. A matting-tool used for lathe-work is a small roughened cylinder or spheroid of hardened steel, journaled in the branches of a furcated handle by which it is applied to the work, over the surface of which it rolls as the object turns in the lathe.

mattock (mat'ok), n. [Formerly also sometimes mathook, simulating hook; < ME. mattocke, mattok, mattoke, < AS. mattuc, mattoc, mettoc, meottoc, mettac: origin unknown. W. matog and Gael. madag are from E. The resemblance of OBulg. motuika = Russ. motuika = Pol. motyka = Lith. mattikas, a mattock, appears to be accidental.] An instrument for loosening the soil in digging, shaped like a pickax, but having its ends broad instead of pointed.

mattoid (mat'oid), n. [It. mattoide, < ML. mattus, stupid, dull, + -oid. See -oid.] One who exhibits symptoms of mental degeneration; a semi-insane person; a crank: a term used by Lombroso to designate a semi-insane person whose ideas and aims (often of a literary or artistic character), while they may simulate those of talent and even of genius, are marked by radical absurdities which the patient is unable, through mental weakness, to perceive.

mattress (mat'res), n. [Formerly also matress, mattrass, matteress; < ME. mattress, matrys, matras = D. matras = Sw. madrass = Dan. madras, < OF. materas, F. matelas = It. materasso, materassa = MHG. matraz, materaz, G. matratze, < ML. matratum, mataratium, mataritium = (with Ar. art.) Sp. almadraque = Pg. almatrac, a mattress, < Ar. matrah, mattress, cushion, bed, prop. a place where anything is thrown, then something thrown down, hence a 'shake-down,' a mattress, < taraha, throw down.] 1. A bed consisting of a bag filled with straw, hair, moss, sponge, husks, excelsior, or other soft and elastic material, and usually quilted or tacked with transverse cords at short intervals to prevent the contents from slipping.

Daniel, Philotas, Ded.

3. In med., in a state of perfect suppuration.—4. In com., become payable; having reached the time fixed for payment; fully due.—Mature insect, in entom., an insect which has attained the last or imago stage of its development.—Mature larva, a larva which has attained its full growth before passing into the pupa state.—Mature pupa, a pupa ready to give forth an imago.—Syn. 1 and 2. Mature, Ripe, digested, well-considered. Mature and ripe both primarily denote the result of the process of physical growth. Ripe emphasizes simply the result: the fruit needs no more nourishment from the stock, and further change will be to over-ripeness and decay. Mature combines with the idea of the result the further suggestion of the process by which the result was reached. Further, ripe always seems figurative when applied to anything besides fruit, especially fruit growing above ground: to speak of a ripe scholar, or a ripened judgment, is distinctly figurative. Mature, on the other hand, seems quite as literal now in the secondary as in the primary sense. The same distinction exists between the verbs and between the nouns corresponding to these adjectives.

mature (mā-tūr'), v.; pret. and pp. matured, ppr. maturing. [< F. maturer = Sp. Pg. madurar = It. maturare, < L. maturare, make ripe, ripen, < maturus, ripe: see mature, a.] I. trans. 1. To cause to ripen; bring to maturity: as, to mature ale.

Prick it [an apple] with a pin full of holes, not deep, and smear it a little with sack, to see if the virtual heat of the wine will not mature it. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 326.

And, like the stores autumnal suns mature,
Through wintry rigours unimpaired endure.
Cowper, Conversation, l. 649.

2. To elaborate or carry to completion; make ripe or ready for use or action: as, to mature one's plans.

I have not the leisure to mature a discourse which should invite the attention of the learned by the extent of its views, or the depth of its investigations.
Story, Misc. Writings, p. 549.

3. In med., to bring to a state of perfect suppuration; maturate.

II. intrans. 1. To come to a state of ripeness; become ripe or perfect: as, wine matures by age or by agitation in a long voyage; the judgment matures by age and experience.—2. 3. To mutter; talk incoherently or idly; wander in talking like a drunken or foolish person; drivel.

Now I shall take my pleasure,
And not my neighbour Justice maunder at me.
Fletcher, Rule a Wife, iii. 1.

He is the same, still inquiring, mandring, gazing, listening, affrighted with every small object.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 576.

maunderer (mân'dėr-ėr), n. 1†. A beggar.

I am no such nipping Christian, but a maunderer upon the pad, I confess. Middleton and Dekker, Roaring Girl.

2. A grumbler; a driveler.

maundering (mân'dėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of maunder, v.] Muttering or driveling speech; a muttering.

The maunderings of discontent are like the voyce and behaviour of a swine. South, Sermons, VII. xiv.

maundingt, n. [Verbal n. of maund[3], v.] Begging.

Being borne and bred vp in the trade of maunding, nipping, and foisting for the space of tenne years.
Rowlands, History of Rogues, quoted in Ribton-Turner's [Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 585.

maundril (mân'dril), n. [Also maundrel. Cf. mandrel.] In coal-mining, a pick with two prongs.

maundy (mân'di), n. [Early mod. E. also maundye, mawndy, mandie, < ME. maundee, maunde, mande, monde, etc., a command, < OF. mandé (F. mandat), < L. mandatum, a command: see mandate, of which maundy is another form, derived through the OF. Senses 2 and 3 are explained as referring to the words of Christ in his discourse at the last supper: Mandatum novum do vobis: ut diligatis invicem, "a new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another" (John xiii. 34), words sung as an anthem at the ceremony of feet-washing, and also as referring to the injunction as to this ceremony (John xiii. 14–15), and to the command to celebrate the sacrament, "This do."] 1†. A commandment. Piers Plowman.—2†. The sacrament of the Lord's supper.

Lord, where wolte thou kepe thi maunde?
Coventry Mysteries, p. 259. (Encyc. Dict.)

The Thorsday byfore there he made his maundee, Sittyng atte soppre he seide thise wordes.
Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 140.

3. The ceremony of washing the feet of poor persons or inferiors, performed as a religious rite on Maundy Thursday in commemoration of Christ's washing the disciples' feet at the last supper. It consists in the washing of the feet of a number of men, generally twelve (in the Western Church usually paupers or poor priests), by a priest, prelate, or sovereign. The custom, of very early origin, is obsolete in the Anglican Church, but is still observed in the Greek Church and in the Roman Catholic Church. See lavipedium, pedilavium.

My wife had been to-day at White Hall to the Maundy, it being Maundy Thursday; but the King did not wash the poor people's feet himself, but the Bishop of London did it for him. Pepys, Diary, III. 100.

4. [cap.] The office appointed to be read during the ceremony of feet-washing.—Maundy dish, a dish in which the maundy money was contained when presented to the sovereign for distribution.—Maundy money, maundy coins, money distributed by the almoner of the English sovereign to certain poor men and women who on Maundy Thursday attend a service in the Chapel Royal at Whitehall. The maundy money is to the amount of a penny for each year of the sovereign's age. From 1662 to the present time small silver coins of the value of fourpence, threepence, twopence, and one penny have been specially struck for this distribution. They are legally (though, with the exception of the threepenny pieces, not practically) current coins of the realm.

The numbers and weights of the fourpences, twopences, and pence, being Maundy coins, are the same for each of the years [1872–81]: 4518 fourpences, 4752 twopences, and 7920 pence. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 482.

Maundy purse†, a purse used to contain the maundy money distributed by the king or queen.—Maundy Thursday, the Thursday of Holy Week, commemorating Christ's last supper, and also both in the Greek and the Western Church his washing of the disciples' feet upon that day. (See def. 3.) It has been the custom in both the Greek and the Western Church since the fifth or sixth century to consecrate the chrism and holy oils on Maundy Thursday. In England the day is observed, in addition to its other special religious services, by a distribution from the sovereign of clothing and money among the poor. (See maundy money.) In the Greek Church Maundy Thursday is called the Great Thursday or the Great and Holy Thursday. Also called Mandate Thursday, Chare Thursday, Sheer Thursday, Cœna Domini, and, improperly, Holy Thursday. See Tenebræ.

maunna (mä'nä). [< maun + na.] Must not. [Scotch.]

As lang as Siller 's current, Deacon, folk maunna look ower nicely at what King's head 's on 't.
Scott, Guy Mannering, xxxii.

Maurandya (mâ-ran'di-ą), n. [NL. (Ortega, 1797), named after Dr. Maurandy, professor of botany at Cartagena in Spain.] A genus of plants of the family Scrophulariaceæ and tribe Antirrhineæ. It is characterized by a large corolla, which is partially gibbous at the base and open at the throat, and by the cells of the anther at length becoming confluent. The plants are climbing herbs, supporting themselves by their twisted petioles and flower-stalks. They have hastate leaves, either angularly lobed or coarsely dentate, and showy violet, purple, or rose-colored axillary flowers. There are 6 species, found in Mexico and Texas, very ornamental and frequently cultivated. The species M. erubescens and M. semperflorens are natives of Mexico. Antirrhinum antirrhiniflorum has been referred to this genus by some authors.

Mauresque (mâ-resk'), n. Same as Moresque.

Mauretanian (mâ-re-tā'ni-an), a. and n. See Mauritanian.

Maurist (mâ'rist), n. [< Maur (see def.) + -ist.] A member of the Congregation of St. Maur, a Benedictine order founded in France in 1618, which was distinguished for the scholarship and literary labors of its members. It had many flourishing houses, but was suppressed in the Revolution. An attempt was made to reëstablish it in the abbey of Solesmes.

Mauritanian (mâ-ri-tā'ni-an), a. and n [Also Mauretanian; < L. Mauritania, Mauretania, < Gr. Μαυρῑτανία, country of the Mauri, < Mauri, Gr. Μαῦροι, Moors: see Moor[4], and cf. Morian.]

I. a. Of or pertaining to Mauritania, an ancient kingdom of northwestern Africa, afterward a Roman province, corresponding to parts of modern Morocco and Algeria.

II. n. One of the race inhabiting ancient Mauritania, called by the Romans Mauri, ancestors of the modern Berbers, or true Moors. See Moor[4].

Mauritia (mâ-rish'ią), n. [NL. (Karl Linnæus the younger, 1781), named in honor of Prince Maurice of Nassau.] A genus of South American palms belonging to the tribe Lepidocaryeæ and the subtribe Mauritieæ, characterized by flowers in catkins borne on the branches of the spikes, and by furrowless seeds. They often attain the height of 100 or 150 feet, and bear a crown of enormous fan-shaped leaves. There are 9 species, found in Brazil, Guiana, and the West Indies. M. vinifera, the Brazilian wine-palm or buriti, and M. flexuosa, the morichi or itapalm, are of great importance to the natives of the regions where they grow. See buriti and ita-palm.

Mauritieæ (mâ-ri-tī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Meissner, 1842), < Mauritia + -eæ.] A subtribe of South American palms of the tribe Lepidocaryeæ, distinguished by the fan-shaped leaves. It embraces 2 genera (Mauritia, the type, and Lepidocaryum) and 14 species, which are confined to Brazil, Guiana, and the West Indies.

Mauritius-weed (mâ-rish'us-wēd), n. A lichen, Roccella fuciformis, which yields archil.

Maurolicidæ (mâ-rō-lis'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Maurolicus + -idæ.] A family of iniomous fishes, typified by the genus Maurolicus. They have a compressed claviform body, no scales, but rows of phosphorescent spots along the sides of the abdomen and scattered spots on the head, a deeply cleft mouth, and the margin of the upper jaw formed laterally by the supramaxillaries, which are dentigerous. The species are inhabitants of the high and deep seas. By some authors they are referred to the family Sternoptychidæ as a subfamily Cocciinæ or Cocciinæ.

Maurolicus (mâ-rol'i-kus), n. [NL., named after Maurolico, an Italian naturalist.] A genus of iniomous fishes, typical of the family Maurolicidæ. The species longest known is M. borealis, the argentine.

Mauser gun, rifle. See gun[1], rifle.

mausolet (mâ'sōl), n. [< L. mausolēum: see mausoleum.] A tomb or mausoleum.

What rarer Mausole may my bones include?
Sylvester, Sonnets on the Miraculous Peace in France, xii.

mausolean (mâ-sō-lē'an), a. [< mausoleum + -an.] Of or pertaining to a mausoleum; monumental.

They shall be honourably interred in mausolean tombs.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 213.

That new Pile
For the departed, built with curious pains
And mausolean pomp.
Wordsworth, Breadalbane's Ruined Mansion.

mausoleum (mâ-sō-lē'um), n. [< L. mausolēum, < Gr. μαυσωλεῖον, the tomb of Mausolus (see def.), hence any splendid tomb, < Μαύσωλος, Mausolus.] 1. [cap.] In Gr. archæol., a very large and magnificent edifice adorned with sculpture, built by Queen Artemisia of Caria as the tomb of her husband, King Mausolus, at Halicarnassus, about 350 B. C., ranking as one of the seven wonders of the world. Hence—2. Any splendid tomb; a grand or stately sepulchral monument or edifice, now usually designed to contain a number of tombs: as, the mausoleum of a royal family.

Borne, full of years and honours, to a mausoleum surpassing in magnificence any that Europe could show.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xviii.

maut (mät), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of malt[1].

mauther (mâ′ᵺėr), n. [Also moather, mother, modder; perhaps a dial. use of mother[1]. Cf. the cognate LG. medder, modder, mödder, aunt, cousin, lit. mother.] A rustic girl; a gawky young woman; a wench. [Prov. Eng.]

Away, you talk like a foolish mauther.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, iv. 4.

P. I am a mother that do want a service.
Qu. O thou 'rt a Norfolk woman (cry thee mercy)
Where maids are mothers [mauthers], and mothers are maids. Brome, Eng. Moor, iii. 1. (Nares.)

When once a giggling mauther you,
And I a red-fac'd chubby boy.
Bloomfield, Rural Tales (1802), p. 5. (Nares.)

"Cheer up, my pretty mauther!" said Mr. Peggotty.
Dickens, David Copperfield, xxxi.

mauvaise honte (mō-vāz′ ôṅt′). [F.: mauvaise, fem. of mauvais, bad (false); honte, shame.] False modesty; bashfulness; shyness.

Nothing but strong excitement and a great occasion overcomes a certain reserve and mauvaise honte which I have in public speaking; not a mauvaise honte which in the least confuses me or makes me hesitate for a word, but which keeps me from putting any fervor into my tone or my action. Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 217.

mauvaises terres. See bad lands, under land[1].

mauvais sujet (mō-vā′ sü-zhā′). [F.: mauvais, bad; sujet, subject, person.] A bad fellow; a "hard case."

mauvaniline (mōv-an′i-lin), n. [< mauve + aniline.] A coal-tar color ($C_{19}H_{17}N_3H_2O$) used in dyeing, prepared from the resinous residue from the arsenic-acid process of making magenta. It dyes silk and wool a fast violet.

mauve (mōv), n. and a. [< F. mauve, mallow: see mallow.] I. n. A reddish-purple dye obtained from aniline, the sulphate of the base mauvein; also, the color produced by it: so called from the resemblance of the color to the purple markings of the petals of mallows. It is now almost out of use. Also called Perkin's purple, aniline violet, and aniline purple.

II. a. Of the color of mauve: as, a mauve dress.

In April [1787] the Queen [Marie Antoinette] bought four yards of ruban mauve, an item worth noting, since many persons imagine that mauve, as the name for a colour, is as modern as magenta.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 287.

mauvein, mauveine (mō′vin), n. [< mauve + -in[2], -ine[2].] The base ($C_{27}H_{24}N_4$) of aniline purple or mauve: same as indisin.

But it was not until 1856 that Perkin prepared mauveine, the first aniline dye, on a large scale.
Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 3.

maver (mā′vėr), n. and v. Same as marver.

maverick (mav′ėr-ik), n. [So called from one Samuel Maverick, a Texan cattle-raiser, who, according to one account, relying upon the natural conformation of his cattle-range to prevent escape, neglected to brand his cattle, which, having on one occasion stampeded and scattered over the surrounding country, became confused with other unbranded cattle in that region, all such being presumed to be "Maverick's"; whence the term maverick for all such unbranded animals in the cattle region.] 1. On the great cattle-ranges of the United States, an animal found without an owner's brand, particularly a calf away from its dam, on which the finder puts his own or his employer's brand; or one of a number of such animals gathered in a general round-up or muster of the herds of different owners feeding together, which are distributed in a manner agreed upon.

Unbranded animals are called mavericks, and when found on the round-up are either branded by the owner of the range on which they are, or else are sold for the benefit of the association.
T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 507.

Hence—2. Anything dishonestly obtained, as a saddle, mine, or piece of land. [Western U. S.]

maverick (mav′ėr-ik), v. t. [< maverick, n.] To seize or brand (an animal) as a maverick; hence, to take possession of without any legal claim; appropriate dishonestly or illegally: as, to maverick a piece of land. [Western U. S.]

mavis (mā′vis), n. [Also formerly or dial. mavish; < ME. mavis, mavys, mavice, < OF. mauvis, malvis, F. mauvis, also mauviette, dial. manviard = Sp. malviz, malvís = It. malviccio, malvizzo, dial. marvizzo (ML. malvitius), a mavis; prob. of Celtic origin: cf. Bret. milfid, milvid, milchouid, a mavis, Corn. melhuet, melhues, a lark.] The song-thrush or throstle, Turdus musicus, a well-known thrush common in most parts of Europe. It haunts gardens and woods near streams and meadows. Its song is sweet and has considerable compass; it can be made to repeat musical airs, and in some instances to articulate words. This name, still common in Scotland, is now rare in England. See thrush.

And bonny sang the mavis
Out o' the thorny brake.
Lamkin (Child's Ballads, III. 99).

The mavis is the sweetest bird
Next to the nightingale.
Courteous Knight (Child's Ballads, VIII. 274).

Big mavis, the mistle-thrush. [East Lothian, Scotland.]

mavish (mā′vish), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of mavis.

"Like two young mavishes," Mr. Peggotty said. I knew this meant, in our local [Norfolk] dialect, like two young thrushes. Dickens, David Copperfield, iii.

mavis-skate (mā′vis-skāt), n. The largest British ray, Raia oxyrhyncha, sometimes 8 feet long and broad.

mavortial (mā-vôr′shal), a. [< L. Mavors (Mavort-), Mars: see Mars, martial.] Martial; warlike.

Once I was guarded with mavortial bands.
Locrine, iv. 1. (Encyc. Dict.)

maw[1] (mâ), n. [< ME. maw, mawe, maghe, < AS. maga = D. maage, maag = MLG. mage, LG. mage, maag = OHG. mago, MHG. mage, G. magen = Icel. magi = Sw. mage = Dan. mave (cf. It. dial. magone, crop of birds, magun, maw, < OHG.), maw, stomach: the native Teut. word for 'stomach.'] 1. The stomach: now used of human beings only in contempt, and rarely of animals.

Rigte as hony is yuel to defye [digest] and engleymeth [cloyeth] the mawe. Piers Plowman (B), xv. 63.

They shall give unto the priest the shoulder, and the two cheeks, and the maw. Deut. xviii. 3.

Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
Milton, To the Lord General Cromwell.

2. The crop or craw of a fowl.

Granivorous birds have the mechanism of a mill; their maw is the hopper which holds and softens the grain, letting it down by degrees into the stomach. Arbuthnot.

3. The sound or air-bladder of a fish.

Isinglass or fish glue, in its raw state, is the "sound," maw, or swimming bladder of various kinds of fish.
Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 355.

4†. Stomach; appetite; inclination.

Unless you had more maw to do me good. Beau. and Fl.

maw[2] (mâ), v. A dialectal (Scotch) form of mow[1].

On the fifteenth day of May
The meadows will not maw.
Proud Lady Margaret (Child's Ballads, VIII. 86).

maw[3] (mâ), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of mew[1].

maw[4]†, n. [Origin obscure.] An old game at cards, played with a piquet pack of thirty-six cards by any number of persons from two to six. Halliwell.

Methought Lucretia and I were at maw; a game, uncle, that you can well skill of. Chapman, May-Day, v. 2.

Maw,
My lord, you were best to try a set at.
Ford, Love's Sacrifice, iii. 2.

★maw-bound† (mâ′bound), a. Costive; constipated.

mawk[1] (mâk), n. [< ME. mawk, mauk, a contr. form of mathek, < Icel. madhkr = Dan. maddik = Norw. makk, a maggot; a dim. of the simple form which appears in AS. mathu = D. G. made, etc., a maggot: see mad[2], made[2]. Cf. maddock.] A maggot. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

mawk[2] (mâk), n. [Short for mawkin, malkin.] A slattern. [Prov. Eng.]

mawkin (mâ′kin), n. See malkin.

mawkish (mâ′kish), a. [< mawk[1] + -ish[1].] 1†. Maggoty. [Not found in this literal sense. Compare mawky, 1.] Hence—2†. Loathsome; apt to cause loathing or nausea; sickening.

Like a faint traveller whose dusty mouth
Grows dry with heat, and spits a mawkish froth.
Addison, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv.

3. Insipid; sickening; sickly: as, mawkish champagne; mawkish sentimentality.

This state of man . . .
Is not a situation of betweenity,
As some word-coiners are disposed to call 't—
Meaning a mawkish as-it-were-ish state, Containing neither love nor hate.
Wolcot, Peter Pindar, p. 206.

Flow, Welsted, flow! like thine inspirer, beer;
Though stale, not ripe; though thin, yet never clear;
So sweetly mawkish, and so smoothly dull;
Heady, not strong; o'erflowing, though not full.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 171.

mawkishly (mâ′kish-li), adv. In a mawkish way.

mawkishness (mâ′kish-nes), n. 1. Mawkish, sickly, or sickening quality.—2. Sickly or qualmish sentimentality.

The imagination of a boy is healthy, and the mature imagination of a man is healthy; but there is a space of life between, in which the soul is in a ferment, the character undecided, the way of life uncertain, the ambition thick-sighted; thence proceeds mawkishness.
Keats, Endymion, Pref.

mawks (mâks), n. A dialectal variant of mawk[2].

mawky (mâ′ki), a. [Also mauky; < mawk[1] + -y[1]. Cf. mawkish.] 1. Maggoty. [Prov. Eng.] —2. Mawkish.

Even John Dryden penned none but mawky plays, nor did Byron succeed at all as a dramatist.
Jon Bee, Essay on Samuel Foote, p. xxiii.

mawm†, n. An obsolete form of malm.

mawmet†, n. See maumet.

mawmetry†, n. See maumetry.

mawmish†, a. See maumish.

mawmouth (mâ′mouth), n. The calico-, grass-, or strawberry-bass, Pomoxys sparoides, a centrarchoid fish. [Local, U. S.]

mawn (mân), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of maund[1].

mawp (mâp), n. [Cf. nope, alp[1].] The bullfinch of Europe, Pyrrhula vulgaris. See cut under bullfinch. [Prov. Eng.]

maw-seed (mâ′sēd), n. The seeds of the opium-poppy, Papaver somniferum: so called from being used as food for cage-birds, especially when molting.

mawskin (mâ′skin), n. The stomach of a calf prepared for making cheese; rennet. [Prov. Eng.]

maw-worm (mâ′wėrm), n. An intestinal worm which may be found in the stomach, as a pinworm or threadworm, such as Oxyuris vermicularis.

max (maks), n. [Said to be an abbr. of maxime*, and orig. applied to gin of the best kind, < F. maxime, < L. maximus, greatest: see maximum.] A kind of gin.

Treat
Boxers to max at the One Tun in Jermyn Street.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends.

maxilla (mak-sil′ä), n.; pl. maxillæ (-ē). [L., the jaw-bone, jaw, dim. of macsula* (> māla, jaw), < √ mac in macerare, soften, macerate, = Gr. √ μακ, μαγ, in μάσσειν, knead, μάζα, a kneaded mass: see mass[2], magma, etc.] In anat. and zoöl.: (a) A jaw or jaw-bone; a maxillary bone; especially, a bone of the upper jaw, as distinguished from the mandible. When the term is applied to both jaw-bones, they are distinguished as maxilla superior and maxilla inferior, the supramaxillary and inframaxillary bones. (b) Specifically, the supramaxillary bone proper, as distinguished from the premaxillary or intermaxillary, which is often fused therewith in the higher vertebrates. (c) In entom., as in insects and arachnidans, one of the second pair of gnathites; either one, right and left, of the second or lower pair of horizontal jaws, next behind or below the mandibles. In the maxillæ, thus forming the under jaw of insects, may be distinguished several parts, as the basal joint or cardo, the footstalk or stipes, the palp-bearer or palpiger, the blade or lacinia, and the galea. See cuts under Hymenoptera and Insecta. (d) In Crustacea, the right or left one of either of the two pairs of gnathites which come next after the mandibles, between these and the maxillipeds. The maxillæ of a crustacean thus correspond to those of an insect, but there is an additional pair of them.—Composite maxillæ, dentate maxillæ, etc. See the adjectives.

maxillar (mak′si-lär), a. Same as maxillary.

Maxillaria (mak-si-lā′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), so called in allusion to the resemblance between the lip and column and the jaws of an animal, < L. maxilla, the jaw.] A genus of orchids of the tribe Vandeæ, type of the subtribe Maxillarieæ, characterized by an erect concave lip with erect lateral lobes and a fleshy column. They are epiphytes arising from pseudobulbs, with usually one or two flat leaves which are coriaceous, thin, or slightly fleshy. There are about 100 species, natives of tropical America.

Maxillarieæ (mak″si-lā-rī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Maxillaria + -eæ.] A subtribe of the tribe Vandeæ of the family Orchidaceæ. It is characterized by leaves that are not plaited and a column (or the part that bears the stamens and pistils) produced into a claw-like foot. It contains 9 genera, all American, and about 176 species.

★maxillary (mak′si-lā-ri), a. and n. [< L. maxillaris, of the jaw, < maxilla, the jaw-bone, jaw: see maxilla.] I. a. Of or pertaining in any way to a jaw or jaw-bone; specifically, of or pertaining to the maxilla alone, in any of the special senses of that word: as, the maxillary bones of a vertebrate; the maxillary palps of an insect.—Anterior internal maxillary vein. Same as facial vein (which see, under facial).—External maxillary artery, a disused name of the third branch of the external carotid, now called the facial artery (which see, under facial).—Inferior maxillary division or nerve. Same as inframaxillary nerve (which see, under inframaxillary).—Internal maxillary artery, one of two terminal branches of the external carotid (the other being the temporal), coursing inward past the neck of the condyle of the lower jaw-bone, and supplying deep parts of the face by means of its numerous branches, of which there are upward of twelve.—Maxillary lobe, in entom., a part of the maxilla attached externally to the stipes, and toothed or fringed internally with hair or bristles, used for holding and masticating food. When long and blade-like, forming the apex of the organ, it is called the lacinia. It may be divided into two parts—the inner and outer or the internal and external lobes. The outer lobe is sometimes transformed into a two-jointed palpus, in addition to the true maxillary palpus.—Maxillary palpi, in entom., appendages, each composed of from one to six joints, attached to the outer sides of the maxillæ. See palpus.—Maxillary segment, the elementary second postoral segment of an insect's head, which bears the maxillæ. It is perhaps represented by parts of the genæ and the occiput. This is generally called the first maxillary, to distinguish it from the second maxillary, or labial segment. See postoral.—Maxillary sinus, the great cavity or hollow of the supramaxillary bone of man and some other mammals, communicating with the middle meatus of the nose: commonly called the antrum Highmorianum or antrum of Highmore. See antrum.—Maxillary teeth, teeth implanted in the supramaxillary bone. In mammals they are distinguished from the incisors, which are implanted in the premaxillary. Such maxillary teeth are the canines, premolars, and molars. In the lower vertebrates, as fishes, they are distinguished from the vomerine, palatal, pharyngeal, etc., teeth.—Superior maxillary nerve, the second main division of the fifth or trigeminal nerve, extending from the Gasserian ganglion, and mainly distributed to the upper jaw.

Inferior Maxillary or Lower Jaw-bone of Man.

A, symphysis menti; B, angle of jaw; C, body or horizontal ramus; D, coronoid process; E, ascending ramus; F, condyle; the teeth inserted along the alveolar border. The concave line between D and F is the condyloid notch.

II. n.; pl. maxillaries (-riz). A jaw-bone; a maxillary bone, or maxilla. In vertebrates at least three maxillaries are commonly distinguished by qualifying terms. These are: (a) the superior maxillary, or supramaxillary; (b) the premaxillary, or intermaxillary; and (c) the inferior maxillary, or inframaxillary. The last of these is the lower jaw-bone; the other two belong to the upper jaw. All these are paired; but each may fuse with its fellow, and the two maxillaries of each half of the upper jaw often coalesce. When used absolutely, the term means the supramaxillary.

maxilliferous (mak-si-lif′ẹ-rus), a. [< L. maxilla, jaw, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Provided with maxillæ: as, the maxilliferous mouth of a crustacean or beetle.

maxilliform (mak-sil′i-fôrm), a. [< L. maxilla, jaw, + forma, form.] Having the form or morphological character of a maxilla: as, a maxilliform limb.

maxilliped, maxillipede (mak-sil′i-ped, -pēd), n. [< L. maxilla, jaw, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] In Crustacea, a foot-jaw or gnathopodite; one of the several limbs which are so modified as to partake of the characters of both jaw and foot, serving for the purpose of both mastication and locomotion. They are the posterior three of the gnathites or appendages of the mouth, the remainder being two pairs of maxillæ and one pair of mandibles. See cuts under Podophthalmia and Cryptophialus.

maxillipedary (mak-sil-i-ped′ạ-ri), a. [< maxilliped + -ary.] Of or pertaining to a maxilliped; having foot-jaws.

Hence results a sudden widening of the second maxillary, as compared with the first maxillipedary somite.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 270.

maxillojugal (mak-sil-ō-jö′gạl), a. [< maxilla + jugum + -al.] Common to the superior maxillary and to the malar (or jugal) bone; malarimaxillary.

maxillomandibular (mak-sil″ō-man-dib′ū-lär), a. [< maxilla + mandibula + -ar[3].] Pertaining to both jaws—that is, to the maxilla and to the mandible.

maxillopalatine (mak-sil-ō-pal′ạ-tin), a. and n. [< maxilla + palate + -ine[1].] I. a. In anat., of or pertaining to the supramaxillary and palatine bones.

II. n. In ornith., a part of the superior maxillary bone which projects inward, forming a palatal process, which may or may not meet its fellow in the midline of the bony palate. Its character and connections are various, and much used in the classification of birds. See cuts under ægithognathous, desmognathous, and dromæognathous.

maxillopharyngeal (mak-sil″ō-fā-rin′jẹ-ạl), a. [< maxilla + pharynx (pharyng-) + -e-al.] Pertaining to the lower jaw-bone or inframaxillary and to the pharynx.—Maxillopharyngeal space, in surgical anat., a triangular area between the side of the pharynx and the ramus of the lower jaw-bone, containing important vessels and nerves, as the internal carotid artery, the internal jugular vein, and the glossopharyngeal, pneumogastric, spinal accessory, and hypoglossal nerves.

maxillopremaxillary (mak-sil″ō-prē-mak′si-lā-ri), a. and n. [< maxilla + premaxilla + -ary.] I. a. Common to the maxilla and to the premaxilla: as, "the maxillopremaxillary part of the skull," Huxley.

II. n. The supramaxillary and premaxillary bones taken together, when, as in many of the higher vertebrates, they fuse into a single bone.

maxilloturbinal (mak-sil-ō-tėr′bi-ṇal), a. and n. [< maxilla + turbine + -al.] I. a. Whorled or scrolled, and articulated with the supramaxillary bone, as is the inferior turbinated bone.

II. n. The inferior turbinated bone. In man it is a light spongy bone curved upon itself, articulating with the supramaxillary, palatal, lacrymal, and ethmoid bones, and projecting into the nasal fossæ, serving to separate the middle from the lower of these fossæ. The name is correlated with ethmoturbinal and sphenoturbinal. See cuts under nasal and craniofacial.

maxim (mak′sim), n. [< F. maxime = Sp. máxima = Pg. maxima = It. massima, < ML. maxima, a maxim, abbr. of LL. maxima propositio, premise, the greatest or chief premise (applied by Boëthius to the rules of the commonplaces which are more than ordinary major premises); fem. of L. maximus, greatest, superl. of magnus, great: see maximum.] 1. A proposition serving as a rule or guide; a summary statement of an established or accepted principle; a pithy expression of a general rule of conduct or action, whether true or false: as, the maxims of religion or of law; the maxims of worldly wisdom or of avarice; ethical maxims.

All which points were observed by the Greekes and Latines, and allowed for maximes in versifying.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 101.

In human laws there be many grounds and maxims which are . . . positive upon authority.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 364.

A maxim is the short and formal statement of an established principle of law. More than two thousand of these maxims now exist, many of which are of great antiquity, and most of which are of the highest authority and value.
Robinson, Elem. of Law, 4.

2. In logic, the rule of a commonplace; an ultimate major premise.—3. An axiom. [Rare.]

Maxims, . . . certain propositions which . . . [are] self evident, or to be received as true.
Locke, Human Understanding, IV. vii. 11.

4. Same as maxima[1].—Syn. 1. Precept, Axiom, etc. See aphorism.

maxima[1] (mak′si-mạ), n. [L., fem. of maximus, greatest: see maxim, maximum.] In medieval musical notation, same as large, 2, when the latter was used in its precise sense as the next denomination above long.

maxima[2], n. Plural of maximum.

maximal (mak′si-mạl), a. [< maximum + -al.] Of the highest or maximum value, etc.; being a maximum.

The maximal and minimal values are reached with full loaded and empty girder.
Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXVI. 240.

A maximal muscular clench was recorded on a dynamometer. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 191.

maximally (mak′si-mạl-i), adv. In the highest degree; to the utmost; extremely.

Those portions of the brain that have just been maximally excited retain a kind of soreness which is a condition of our present consciousness. W. James, Mind, IX. 12.

maximed (mak′simd), a. [< maxim + -ed[2].] Reduced to a maxim; pithily formulated. [Rare.]

There is another maximed truth in this connection: "Knowledge is a two-edged sword."
J. C. Van Dyke, Books and How to Use them, p. 19.

Maxim gun. See machine-gun.

Maximilian (mak-si-mil′i-ạn), n. [So called from Maximilian, the name of various rulers of Bavaria.] A Bavarian gold coin worth about 13*s.* 6*d.* English. Simmonds.—Maximilian armor, an armor decorated and rendered more rigid by flutings, with which all the large surfaces are occupied. This armor, introduced toward the close of the fifteenth century, is generally thought to have originated among the skilful armorers of Milan, and is also called Milan armor.

Maximiliana (mak-si-mil-i-ā′nạ), n. [NL. (Martius, 1831), named after Maximilian Alexander Philipp, Prince of Neuwied.] An untenable name for Englerophœnix, a genus of palms of the tribe Cocoineæ, distinguished by the minute petals and six slightly exserted stamens of the male flowers, and the one-seeded fruit. There are 4 species, natives of Brazil, Guiana, and the island of Trinidad. Englerophœnix regia is the inaja- or jagua-palm of the Amazon; E. Caribæa is the crown-palm of some of the West Indies. See cocorite.

maximist (mak′si-mist), n. [< maxim + -ist.] One who has a fondness for quoting or using maxims. Imp. Dict.

maximization (mak″si-mi-zā′shọn), n. [< maximize + -ation.] The act or process of maximizing, or raising to the highest degree. Bentham. Also spelled maximisation.

maximize (mak′si-mīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. maximized, ppr. maximizing. [< L. maximus, greatest (see maximum), + -ize.] To make as great as possible; raise or increase to the highest degree. Also spelled maximise.

In the absolute original use, 'can,' now rare (being superseded by can) except where a degree of contingency is involved, when the use passes insensibly into the later uses. The uses of may are much involved, the notions of power, ability, opportunity, permission, contingency, etc., passing into each other, and may in many constructions being purposely or inevitably used with more or less indefiniteness. The principal uses are as follows: (a) To indicate subjective ability, or abstract possibility: rarely used absolutely (as in the first quotation), but usually with an infinitive (not, however, as a mere auxiliary). Ask me not, for I may not speak of it.

Tennyson, Holy Grail.

(b) To indicate possibility with contingency.

What-so-eer thou be seruyd, loke thou be feyn,
For els thou may want it when thou hast nede.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 59.

Whittier, Amy Wentworth.

It might be May or April, he forgot,
The last of April or the first of May.
Tennyson, The Brook.

The young may die, but the old must!
Longfellow, Golden Legend, iv.

In this sense, when a negative clause was followed by a contingent clause with if, may in the latter clause was formerly used elliptically, if I may meaning 'if I can control it' or 'prevent it.'

My body, at the leeste way,
Ther shal no wight defoulen, if I may.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 690.

"Sey boldely thi wille," quod he,
"I nyl be wroth, if that I may,
For nought that thou shalt to me say."
Rom. of the Rose, l. 3099.

Sometimes may is used merely to avoid a certain bluntness in putting a question, or to suggest doubt as to whether the person to whom the question is addressed will be able to answer it definitely.

How old may Phillis be, you ask,
Whose beauty thus all hearts engages?
Prior, Phillis's Age.

The preterit might is similarly used, with some slight addition of contempt.

Who might be your mother,
That you insult, exult, and all at once,
Over the wretched?
Shak., As you Like it, iii. 5. 35.

(c) To indicate opportunity, moral power, or the absolute power residing in another agent.

As I shalle devyse zou, suche as thei ben, and the names how thei clepen hem; to suche entent, that zee mowe knowe the difference of hem and of othere.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 53.

Shak., Tempest, iii. 2. 69.

(d) To indicate permission: the most common use.

Thou mayest be no longer steward. Luke xvi. 2.

An I may hide my face, let me play Thisby too.
Shak., M. N. D., i. 2. 53.

I might not be admitted. Shak., T. N., i. 1. 25.

In this sense may is scarcely used now in negative clauses, as permission refused amounts to an absolute prohibition, and accordingly removes all doubt or contingency. (e) To indicate desire, as in prayer, aspiration, imprecation, benediction, and the like. In this sense might is often used for a wish contrary to what can or must be: as, O that I might recall him from the grave!

May you live happily and long for the service of your country. Dryden, Ded. of Æneid.

Certain as this, O! might my days endure,
From age inglorious and black death secure.
Pope, Iliad, viii. 667.

That which I have done,
May He within himself make pure!
Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

(f) In law, may in a statute is usually interpreted to mean must, when used not to confer a favor, but to impose a duty in the exercise of which the statute shows that the public or private persons are to be regarded as having an interest.

B. As an auxiliary: In this use notionally identical with may in the contingent uses above, in A (b), but serving to form the so-called compound tenses of the subjunctive or potential mode, expressing contingency in connection with purpose, concession, etc. May is so used—(1) In substantive clauses, or clauses that take the place of or are in apposition with the subject or object or predicate of a sentence: introduced by that.

It was my secret wish that he might be prevailed on to accompany me. Byron.

They apprehended that he might have been carried off by gipsies. Southey.

I heard from an old officer that when in the West Indies he was told by a lady, at whose house he was dining, that he might not like the soup, as it was made from snakes.
N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 335.

(2) In conditional clauses. [Rare, except in clauses where permission is distinctly expressed.]

Lands, goods, horse, armour, anything I have Is his to use, so Somerset may die.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 53.

(3) In concessive clauses.

Whatever the stars may have betokened, this August, 1749, was a momentous month to Germany. G. H. Lewes.

A great soul may inspire a sick body with strength; but if the body were well, it would obey yet more promptly and effectually. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 55.

(4) In clauses expressing a purpose.

Was it not enough for thee to bear the contradiction of sinners upon Earth, but thou must still suffer so much at the hands of those whom thou diedst for, that thou mightest bring them to Heaven? Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. vi.

Constantius had separated his forces that he might divide the attention and resistance of the enemy. Gibbon.

May-curlew (mā′kėr″lū), n. The whimbrel, Numenius phæopus.

May-day (mā′dā), n. The first day of May: a day on which the opening of the season of flowers and fruit was formerly celebrated throughout Europe: it is still marked in some places by various festive observances. The chief features of the celebration in Great Britain (where, however, it has nearly disappeared) are the gathering of hawthorn-blossoms and other flowers, the crowning of the May-queen, dancing round the May-pole, etc.

'Tis as much impossible,
Unless we sweep 'em from the door with cannons,
To scatter em, as 'tis to make 'em sleep
On May-day morning. Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 4. 15.

Against Maie-day, Whitsunday, or some other time of the year, every parish, towne, or village assemble themselves, both men, women, and children; and either all together, or dividing themselves into companies, they goe some to the woods and groves, some to the hills and mountaines, some to one place, some to another, where they spend all the night in pleasant pastimes, and in the morning they return, bringing with them birche boughes and branches of trees to deck their assemblies withal.
Stubbes, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 454.

maydet, maydent. Obsolete forms of maid, maiden.

Maydeæ (mā′dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Mathieu, 1853), < Mays, Gaertner's name for Zea, the Indian corn, + -eæ.] A tribe of grasses characterized by the unisexual spikelets, of which the staminate is terminal. The tribe contains 7 genera and about 16 species, widely dispersed. The most important genus of the tribe is Zea, the maize or Indian corn.

May-dew (mā′dū), n. The dew of May, which is said to have great virtue in whitening linen, and to have also other remarkable properties. It is still the practice for young people in some parts of Great Britain to go out into the fields in the morning of the first of May, and bathe their faces with May-dew—a survival of the impression or belief of former times that it preserves beauty.

My wife away down with Jane and W. Hewer to Woolwich, in order to a little ayre and to lie there to-night, and so to gather May-dew to-morrow morning, which Mrs. Turner hath taught her is the only thing in the world to wash her face with. Pepys, Diary, III. 137.

may-drink (mā′dringk), n. [Tr. Flem. meydrank, D. meidrank, G. maitrank.] A beverage popular in Belgium and northern Germany at the season of the flowering of the sweet woodruff, Asperula odorata. It is prepared by putting sprigs of this plant into a flask of light white wine, and sweetening with sugar. Bits of pineapple or orange, or a few fresh leaves of the black currant, are sometimes added.

Mayduke (mā′dūk), n. [Poss. a corruption of Médoc, in France, whence these cherries are said to have been introduced.] A variety of cherry of the sour type.

Mayencian (mā-en′si-an), n. [< Mayence + -ian.] The name given in France and Belgium to a division of the Miocene Tertiary typically developed in the Mainz (or Mayence) basin. The formation consists of marine, brackish, and fresh-water deposits, characterized by numerous interesting fossils. Part of the Molasse of Switzerland is considered the equivalent of the Mayencian.

Mayer (mā′ėr), n. [< May[4] + -er[1].] One who goes a maying, or takes part in May-day festivities.

On the Mayers deign to smile.
Mayer's Song, Hone's Every-day Book, II. 571.

Specifically—(a) In England, the hawthorn or may; also the cuckoo-flower (Cardamine pratensis), the marsh-marigold (Caltha palustris), and, rarely, other plants. (b) In the United States, chiefly the trailing arbutus, Epigæa repens. See Epigæa. (c) In the West Indies, Dalbergia Amerimnum and Ecastophyllum Ecastophyllum.—May-flower decoration, in ceram. See May-flower porcelain.—May-flower porcelain, a name given to a variety of porcelain which is thickly covered with may- or hawthorn-blossoms modeled in relief, the flowers nearly touching one another, so that the sharp edges form a bristly covering of the whole surface. These flowers are colored, and sometimes gilded. This decoration is almost a specialty of Dresden ware.

Mayflower compact. See compact[2].

May-fly (mā′flī), n. 1. A neuropterous insect of the family Ephemeridæ; one of the Ephemerina; an ephemerid; a day-fly. See the technical words, and cut under day-fly.—2. In Great Britain, a neuropteroid insect of the order Trichoptera, and especially of the family Phryganeidæ, or any caddis-fly.

He loves the May-fly, which is bred of the cod-worm or caddis. I. Walton, Complete Angler.

3. An artificial fly made in imitation of the May-fly.

He makes a May-fly to a miracle, and furnishes the whole country with angle-rods.
Addison, Sir Roger and Will Wimble.

May-fowl (mā′foul), n. The whimbrel. [Local, Eng.]

May-game (mā′gām), n. 1. Sport or play such as is usual on or about the first of May; hence, frolic; jest.

What May-game hath misfortune made of you?
Spenser, F. Q., V. vii. 40.

Send hither all the rural company
Which deck the May-games with their clownish sports!
Beaumont, Masque of Inner-Temple.

A goodly May-game in Fenchurch-street, with drums, and guns, and pikes; and with the nine worthies who rode, and each of them made his speech, there was also a morrice dance, and an elephant and castle, and the Lord and Lady of the May preparing to make up the show.
Strype, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 456.

2. One who takes part in the May-games or May-day sports; hence, a trifler; also, one who is an object of May-games or jests; a make-game.

I'll make you know me. Set your faces soberly;
Stand this way, and look sad; I'll be no May-game.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iii. 1.

Why should not I, a May-game, scorn the weight
Of my sunk fortunes? Ford, Lover's Melancholy, i. 2.

I will laugh at thee, and at myself,
To have been so much a fool; you are a fine may-game.
Shirley, Hyde Park, iii. 2.

May-garland (mā′gär″land), n. A wreath of flowers formerly borne from house to house by children on May-day.

Two in every group carried between them, suspended from a stick, the May-garland, formed of two small transverse willow hoops, decorated with a profusion of primroses and other flowers, and fresh green foliage.
The Antiquary, May, 1880.

mayhap (mā′hap), adv. [Also mayhaps; an ellipsis of it may hap. So also dial. mayhappen*, contr. mappen. Cf. maybe.] Peradventure; it may happen; perhaps.

"Mayhap there is more meant than is said in it," quoth my father. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iii. 37.

Mayhap his eye brightened as he heard
The song grow louder and the hall they neared.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 100.

★ May-haw (mā′hâ), n. A small tree, Cratægus æstivalis, of the southern United States. Its fruit, which ripens in May, is used for preserves, jellies, etc. Also apple-haw.

mayhem (mā′hem), n. [Formerly also maiheme; an earlier form of maim, retained archaically in legal use: see maim, n.] At common law, a crime consisting in the violent doing of a bodily hurt to another person, such as renders him less able in fighting either to defend himself or to annoy his adversary, as distinguished from one which merely disfigures. See maim.

May-hill (mā′hil), n. A period of difficulty or danger; a critical juncture; crisis: in allusion to the opinion that May is a trying month for invalids.—To climb up May-hill, to get through the month of May safely; hence, to pass the crisis or critical or difficult part.

Whereas in our remembrance Ale went out when Swallows came in, seldom appearing after Easter, it now hopeth (having climbed up May-hill) to continue its course all the year. Fuller, Worthies, Derbyshire, I. 252. (Davies.) maying (mā′ing), n. [Verbal n. of May[4], v.] The observance of May-day, and the sports and games indulged in on that occasion.

Now it befell in the moneth of lusty May that queene Guenever called unto her the knyghtes of the round table, and gave them warning that, early in the morning, she should ride on maying into the woods and fields beside Westminster. The Death of Arthur, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 460.

Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.
Herrick, To Corinna.

May-lady (mā′lā″di), n. The queen or lady of the May, in old May-games.

Some light huswife, belike, that was dressed like a May-lady, and, as most of our gentlewomen are, was more solicitous of her head tiers than of her health.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 473.

May-lily (mā′lil″i), n. The lily-of-the-valley, Convallaria majalis.

May-lord (mā′lôrd), n. A young man chosen to preside over the festivities of May-day. [Prov. Eng.]

The shepherd boys who with the muses dwell Met in the plain their may-lords new to choose (For two they yearly choose), to order well
Their rural sports the year that next ensues.
P. Fletcher, Purple Island, i. 2.

May-morn (mā′môrn), n. [< ME. may-morne.] The morning of May-day; figuratively, freshness; vigor. Compare May-dew.

My thrice-puissant liege
Is in the very May-morn of his youth, Ripe for exploits. Shak., Hen. V., i. 2. 120.

maynt, mayne[1]†, n. Obsolete forms of main[1].

mayne[2]†, maynyt, n. Same as meiny.

mayonnaise (mā′on-āz, F. mä-yo-nāz′), n. [< F. mayonnaise, a sauce (see def.). See the quotation.] In cookery, a sauce composed of yolks of eggs and salad-oil beaten together with vinegar or lemon-juice to the consistency of thick cream, and seasoned with salt, pepper, garlic, etc. It is an esteemed dressing for salads, cold fish, and some other dishes.

I was told by a French friend at Dax, in the Landes, that the proper way of pronouncing the word mayonnaise was bayonnaise, Bayonne being the birthplace of that now world-famed salad. N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 174.

mayor (mā′or or mār: see etym.), n. [Early mod. E. mair, maire, mayre, mayer, the prop. E. form mair being still retained in the pron. mār; the spelling mayor, changed from the occasional earlier mayer, perhaps to conform the termination to that of chancellor, purveyor, etc., but more prob. in imitation of the Sp., being introduced about the middle of the 16th century, and displacing the older (F.) spelling without affecting the pron. until more recent times; < ME. maire, mayre, meire, meyre, < AF. maire, meire, meir, meyre, OF. maire (later also maiour, mayeur, major), F. maire = Sp. mayor = Pg. maior, mayor, a mayor, = OHG. meior, meier, MHG. meier, meiger, G. meier (as a surname, Meyer), a steward, bailiff (majordomo), < ML. major, a mayor, prefect, chief, etc., < L. major, greater, compar. of magnus, great: see major, of which mayor is a doublet.] The principal officer of a municipality; the chief magistrate of a city or borough. The mayor of London (that is, of the district known as the City, comprising only a small part of the whole area of London: see city of London, under city, n.) and those of York, of Dublin, and, recently, of Liverpool, Birmingham, and other large (British) cities have the title of lord mayor. The title mayor is not used in Scotland, provost taking its place. Compare burgomaster.

This yere [1208] began the names of Mayers and sherefs in London. Arnold's Chronicle, p. xv.

And there in the east ende of the hall, where the maire kepeth the hustinges, the maire and all the aldermen assembled about him. Sir T. More, Works, p. 61.

The first historical appearance of the office of mayor is in London, where the recognition of the communa by the national council in 1191 is immediately followed by the mention of Henry Fitz-Alwyn as mayor.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 485.

Lord Mayor's Court. See court.—Mayor of the palace, in France, originally the first officer of the royal household, then the first officer of state, under the Merovingian kings. Gradually these officials aggrandized their own influence to the detriment of that of the monarchs, till the latter ruled only nominally, all real power being usurped by the mayors. The most distinguished among them were Pepin of Héristal, his son Charles Martel, and the latter's son Pepin "the Short," who in 751 or 752 dethroned the last of the Merovingians, Childeric III., and founded the Carolingian dynasty.—Mayor's court, a minor judicial tribunal, held in cities by the mayor as judge.

mayoral (mā′or-al), a. [< mayor + -al.] Of or pertaining to a mayor or mayors, or the office of mayor.

May-pole (mā′pōl), n. 1. A pole around which the people dance in May-day festivities. It was usually cut and set up afresh on May-day morning, drawn by a long procession of oxen, decorated, as were also the pole itself and the wagon, with flowers and ribbons; but in some cases a pole once set up was left from year to year, as notably the famous pole of the parish of St. Andrew Undershaft in London, which was cut down in the reign of Edward VI. At the restoration of Charles II. a May-pole 134 feet high was set up in the Strand. A few May-poles still remain in England, although the celebration is almost obsolete.

Their chiefest jewel they bring from thence is the Maie-pole, which they bring home with great veneration, as thus — they have twentie or fourtie yoake of oxen, every oxe having a sweete nosegaie of flowers tied to the tip of his hornes, and these oxen drawe home the May-poale. Stubbes, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 455.

2. An ale-stake. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—3. A tree of Jamaica, Spathelia simplex, of the order Rutaceæ. It has a tall slender stem with a crown of leaves at the top, like a palm. Also called mountain-pride and mountain-green.

maythorn (mā′thôrn), n. [< May[4] + thorn.] The hawthorn: so called to distinguish it from the earlier flowering blackthorn. See May[4], 3.

The maythorn and its scent. Mrs. Browning.

May-time (mā′tīm), n. [< ME. may time; < May[4] + time[1].] May; the season of May.

Alle freliche foules that on that frith songe, for merthe of that may time thei made moche noyce.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 822.

They . . . (for the time
Was maytime, and as yet no sin was dream'd)
Rode under groves that look'd a paradise.
Tennyson, Guinevere.

mayweed (mā′wēd), n. [Early mod. E. maie-weed; a var., simulating May[4], of maytheweed.] A composite plant, Anthemis Cotula, a common weed throughout Europe and Asiatic Russia, and, by naturalization, in America. It is a branching annual a foot or two high, the leaves finely divided, and the flower-heads having a yellow disk and white rays. The foliage is pungently ill-scented, and is said to blister the hands. It has been used as an emmenagogue and antispasmodic. Other names are dog's-camomile, dog's-fennel, stinking camomile; also Balder-brae, buphthalmum, dill-weed. See particularly Anthemis and Cotula.

mazer (mā′zėr), n. [Early mod. E. also maser; < ME. maser, masere, a bowl, orig. of maple-wood, prob. not < AS. mæser*, maser*, maple (or other spotted or mottled wood), which is found only in deriv. adj. mæseren*, occurring once erroneously written mæsen ("vi. mæsene sceala," '6 maple vessels'), and perhaps in comp. Maserfeld, a local name, but from the cognate Icel. mösurr, a maple-tree, maple-wood (mösurr-bolli, a maple bowl, mösurr-skāl, a maple vessel: see skoal), = MLG. maser, a maple-tree, = OHG. masar, MHG. G. maser, a knur or knob on a tree, a knot or spot in maple and other wood, MHG. also a bowl of spotted or mottled wood (> OF. mazre, madre, spotted or mottled wood (> OF. (and F.) madré, spotted, mottled), and mazerin, a drinking-vessel: see mazerin); from the noun seen in OD. mase, masche, maesche* = MLG. mase = OHG. māsā, MHG. māse, G. mase, a spot, whence also ult. E. measles.] 1†. Hard mottled wood, understood to be maple, formerly used in making the bowls or goblets hence called mazers.

Off lanycolle thou shall prove,
That is a cuppe to my behove,
Off maser it is ful clene.
MS. Cantab. Ff. v. 48, f. 50. (Halliwell.)

2. A bowl or large drinking-cup without a foot, of maple or other hard wood, and often richly decorated with carving and mounted with silver or other metal. In later use the term was applied to bowls entirely of metal. A number of mazers are preserved in England, dating from different epochs from the thirteenth to the eighteenth century.

They toke away the sylver vessell,
And all that they myght get,
Peces, masars, and spones
Wolde they non forgete.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 75).

Then loe, Perigot, the Pledge which I plight,
A mazer ywrought of the Maple warre.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., August.

They powre wine into a great bowle, . . . and then dip in that bowle or mazer a sword.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 396.

In the wardrobe above they shew'd us fine wrought plate, porcelan, mazers of beaten and solid gold set with diamonds, rubies, and emeralds. Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 25, 1645.

3†. The head; the skull or brain-box: same as mazard, 2.

Are thy mad brains in thy mazer? Ford, Fancies, iv. 1.

mazer-dish† (mā′zėr-dish), n. A mazer, or other dish made of maple.

There was neither mazer-dish nor standing-cup upon the little table, at the elbow of his [the abbot's] huge chair of state. Scott, Monastery.

mazerin†, mazerine† (maz′e-rin), n. [Also mazarin; ME., < OF. mazerin, mazelin, madelin, maderin (ML. scyphus mazerinus), a drinking-bowl of wood, < mazre, madre, spotted wood: see mazer.] A drinking-vessel; a porringer.

One of Her Majesty's Knurl'd Dishes, weight 52 Ounces, and one Silver Mazerine, Weight 20 Ounces, both engrav'd with His late Majesty's Arms.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 183.

mazer-tree (mā′zėr-trē), n. The common maple of Great Britain, Acer campestre. Also maser-tree.

mazer-wood (mā′zėr-wụd), n. 1. Same as mazer, 1.—2. Gutta-percha. See the quotation.

In the Museum Tradescantianum . . . the following entry occurs: . . . "The plyable mazer wood, being warmed, will work to any form." This museum became the nucleus of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. The word "mazer," variously spelt, often occurs in early English poetry, and is specially mentioned in old catalogues and wills. It is by no means impossible that mazer cups may have been made of gutta percha, as its lightness, strength, and non-liability to fracture would recommend it; and curiously enough one of the vernacular names of the tree yielding gutta percha is "mazer wood tree."
Encyc. Brit., XI. 338.

mazily (mā′zi-li), adv. In a mazy manner; by winding and turning; with confusion or perplexity.

The brooks of Eden mazily murmuring.
Tennyson, Experiments in Quantity, Milton.

maziness (mā′zi-nes), n. The state of being mazy or mazed; perplexity or perplexingness.

mazological (maz-ọ̄-loj′i-kạl), a. [< mazology-y + -ic-al.] Mastological; mammalogical.

mazologist (mā-zol′ọ̄-jist), n. [< mazology + -ist.] A mastologist or mammalogist.

mazology (mā-zol′ọ̄-ji), n. [< Gr. μαζός, breast, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Mammalogy; mastology; therology.

mazurka (ma-zör′kạ), n. [Also as F. mazourka; < Pol. mazurka, a dance, < Mazur, a native of Mazovia, Poland.] 1. A lively Polish dance, properly for four or eight pairs of dancers, originally performed with a singing accompaniment. The steps and figures are various, and may be improvised. The more modern mazurka is a polka with two sliding steps instead of one; the music is in triple time. 2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is triple and moderately rapid, with a capricious accent on the second beat of the measure. Older mazurkas usually have a drone bass. The prominence of the mazurka form is mainly due to the predilection shown for it in the works of Chopin.

mazy (mā′zi), a. [< maze + *-y*1.] Having the character of a maze; perplexing from turns and windings; winding; intricate.

Then out again he flies, to wing his mazy round.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence.

Mazy herring. See herring.—Mazy pack, a parish fool. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

mazzard, n. See mazard.

★M. C. An abbreviation of Member of Congress.

M. D. An abbreviation (a) of the Latin Medicinæ Doctor, Doctor of Medicine (see doctor, 2); (b) in musical notation, of mano destra (Italian) or main droite (French), 'right hand,' indicating a passage to be performed by the right hand.

me1 (mē), pron. [Early mod. E. also mee; < ME. me, < AS. dat. mē, me = OS. mi = OFries. mi = D. mij = MLG. mer = OHG. MHG. Hence *mine*1. Cf. myself.] A pronoun of the first person, used only in the oblique cases (accusative and dative, classed together as objective), and supplying these cases of the pronoun I.

"Me, me," he cry'd, "turn all your swords alone On me! the fact confest, the fault my own."
Dryden, Æneid, ix.

The dative occurs—(a) To express the indirect object: as, give me a drink; bring me that book.

What me bitide other bifalle
Ihc schal the foreward holden alle.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 63.

Pay me that thou owest. Mat. xviii. 28.

(b) To express the indirect object in mere reference or mention—that is, to bring into the predicate, as an apparent indirect object, the actual subject (the ethical dative): a form of expression adding a certain life or vivacity to colloquial speech, and therefore a favorite use in Shakspere and other Elizabethan dramatists.

Comes mee a page of Amphialus, who with humble smiling reverence delivered a letter unto him from Clinias.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

He plucked me ope his doublet and offered them his throat to cut. Shak., J. C., i. 2. 267.

I remember me, I'm marry'd and can't be my own Man again. Congreve, Way of the World, ii. 8.

(c) In such expressions as woe is me, well is me, leeze me (lief is me).

Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech! Ps. cxx. 5.

(d) Before the impersonal verbs think and seem, where me is conventionally written with the verb as one word, as methinks (preterit methought), meseems (preterit meseemed).

They talk'd,
Meseem'd, of what they knew not.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

(e†) In such expressions as me rather were, me liever were, etc. See have and lief.

me2†. [ME., an abbr. form of man, < AS. man, mon, or of the pl. men, < AS. men, used indefinitely: see man.] One; they: used indefinitely.

Thenne hadde Fortune folwynge hure two faire maidenes, Concupiscentia-carnis me calde the eldere mayde.
Piers Plowman (C), xii. 174.

★M. E. An abbreviation (a) of Methodist Episcopal; (b) of Mining Engineer: as, John Smith, M. E.; (c) of Middle English: used (as ME.) in the etymologies of this work.

meach, meaching. See *miche*1, miching.

meacock† (mē′kok), n. and a. [Also mecock, mecocke; supposed to stand for meekock*, < meek + dim. -ock; but this is doubtful.] I. n. A timorous, cowardly fellow.

A meacock is he who dreadth to see bloud shed.
Mir. for Mags., p. 418.

I shall be compted a Mecocke, a milksop.
Lyly, Euphues, p. 109.

Fools and meacocks,
To endure what you think fit to put upon 'em.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, v. 2.

II. a. Tame; timorous; cowardly.

'Tis a world to see
How tame, when men and women are alone,
A meacock wretch can make the curstest shrew.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1. 315.

mead1 (mēd), n. [Early mod. E. also meath; < ME. mede, methe, < AS. medu, meodu = OFries. D. MLG. mede = OHG. metu, mito, MHG. mete, met, G. meth, met = Icel. mjǭdhr = Sw. E. amethyst), = Zend madhu (= Pers. mai), wine, = Skt. madhu, honey, sugar, < madhu, adj., sweet.] 1. A strong liquor made by mixing honey with water and flavoring it, yeast or some similar ferment being added, and the whole allowed to ferment. It was a favorite beverage in the middle ages, and is made according to different recipes in different parts of England down to the present day. When carefully made it will keep for a long time, and improve with age.

And being now in hand, to write thy glorious praise,
Fill me a bowl of meath, my working spirit to raise.
Drayton, Polyolbion, iv. 112.

Carmen
Are got into the yellow starch, and chimney-sweepers
To their tobacco, and strong waters, Hum, Meath, and Obarni. B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 1.

My friend, wandering from house to house, at last discovered an old man, who brought him a bowl of mead in exchange for a cigar. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 351.

2. A sweet drink charged with carbonic gas, and flavored with some syrup, as sarsaparilla. [U. S.]

mead2 (mēd), n. [< ME. mede, < AS. mād, a mead, meadow: see meadow, the more orig. form. *Mead*2 and meadow are related as *lease*1 and leasow, shade and shadow.] Same as meadow: now chiefly used in poetry.

And if thi mede is drossy, barayne, olde,
Let plowe it efte, and playne it efte doune lowe.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 188.

She was gathering Narcissus flowers in the meads of Sicily. Bacon, Physical Fables, xi.

meader (mē′dėr), n. [< ME. (not found), < AS. mæthere, a mower, < mæth, a mowing: see math.] A mower. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

meadow (med′ō), n. [< ME. medowe, medewe, medwe, < AS. mād (nom. and acc. sing.), pl. mādwa, māda, mēdwa (the nom. sing. mādwe, f., and mādwa, m., being rare and uncertain; stem mādw- or mædw-) = OFries. mede = D. mat, a meadow, = MLG. mēde, made = OHG. mata* (matta*), in comp. mato-screch, a grasshopper, MHG. mate, matte, G. matte, also matt (esp. in place-names), a meadow; usually referred, as 'a place mowed' or 'to be mowed,' to the verb *mow*1, AS. māwan; but the noun with the formative -d (-th) from this verb is math (AS. mæth = OHG. mād, MHG. māt, G. mahd, etc.), a different word, and the AS. word in its orig. form (stem mādw-) can hardly be so formed from māwan, mow, there being no recognized formative -dw. But possibly the root mād-, mād- (the formative being -w), may be cognate with L. mētere, reap, mow, which may contain an extended form of the root of mow: see *mow*1.] 1. A low, level tract of land under grass, and generally mown annually or oftener for hay; also, a piece of grass-land in general, whether used for the raising of hay or as pasture-land. Meadows are often on the banks of a river or lake, but so far above the surface as to be dry enough to produce grass and herbage of a superior quality. In some parts of the United States, as New England, land so situated is called meadow or meadow-land without reference to its use, and in other parts, especially in the West, bottom or bottom-land.

Made hem alle to assemble in the Dukes londe in a grete medowe vpon a rivere. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 70.

This golden meadow, lying ready still Then to be mow'd when their occasions will.

To have in mind, view, or contemplation; intend; hence, to purpose or design.

We fayne and forge and father soch thinges of Tullie, as he neuer ment in deed. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 123.

No man means evil but the devil.
Shak., M. W. of W., v. 2. 15.

Alas, poor creature! he meant no man harm,
That I am sure of. Ford, 'Tis Pity, iii. 9.

Sir Peter, I know, means to call there about this time.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 2.

I wish I knew what my father meant us to do.
E. S. Sheppard, The Children's Cities.

2. To signify, or be intended to signify; indicate; import; denote.

What meaneth the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? 1 Sam. iv. 6.

If aught else great bards beside
In sage and solemn tunes have sung, . . .
Where more is meant than meets the ear.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 120.

When Tully owns himself ignorant whether Iessus, in the twelve tables, means a funeral song, or mourning garment; and Aristotle doubts whether ουρευς, in the Iliad, signifies a mule, or muleteer, I may surely, without shame, leave some obscurities to happier industry, or future information. Johnson, Dict., Pref. p. iii.

3†. To mention; tell; express.

[They] present hom to Priam, that was prise lord:
There menyt thai thaire message & with mouthe told.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 7838.

To mean business. See business. = Syn. 2. Intend, design, contemplate (with present participle).

II. intrans. 1. To be minded or disposed; have intentions of some kind: usually joined with an adverb: as, he means well.

Godd woll . . . helpe Hys servants that meane truly.
Paston, Letters, II. 351.

Evans. His meaning is good.
Shal. Ay, I think my cousin meant well.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 265.

2. To have thought or ideas; have meaning. [Rare.]

And he who, now to sense now nonsense leaning,
Means not, but blunders round about a meaning.
Pope, Prol. to Satires, l. 186.

3†. To speak; talk. Halliwell.

Leve we stylle at the quene,
And of the greyhound we wylle mene
That we before of tolde.
MS. Cantab. Ff. ii. 38, f. 74. (Halliwell.)

Than Calcas, the clerke, came fro his tent, ffongit hir faire, and with fyne chere
Toke hir into tent, talket with hir fast,
And menit of hir maters, as thai in mynd hade.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 8100.

mean[2] (mēn), a. [< ME. meene, mene, earlier imene, < AS. gemǣne (very rarely and prob. by mere error without the prefix, mǣne) = OS. gimēni = OFries. mēne = MD. gemene, D. gemeen = MLG. gemeine, gemēne, gemēn, LG. gemeen = OHG. gimeini, MHG. gemeine, G. gemein = Sw. gemen = Dan. gemeen = Goth. gamains, common, general; perhaps akin to L. communis, common, general: see common. From this word in the orig. sense 'common,' 'general' has developed the sense 'low' in rank or quality, hence 'base' (cf. similar senses of common); but this development has prob. been assisted by the confluence of the word with one orig. distinct, namely, AS. mǣne, false, wicked (mǣne āth, a false oath) (= OHG. MHG. mein, false, = Icel. meinn, harmful, etc.), < mān, false, also a noun, falsehood, wickedness, evil: see manswear.] 1†. Common; general.

Ther-of merveiled the mene peple what it myght mene.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 145.

2. Of a common or low origin, grade, quality, etc.; common; humble: as, a man of mean parentage; mean birth or origin; a mean abode.

Alle manere of men, the mene and the ryche.
Piers Plowman (C), i. 20.

So . . . my meaner ministers
Their several kinds have done.
Shak., Tempest, iii. 3. 87.

Meaner things, whom instinct leads,
Are rarely known to stray. Cowper, Doves.

3. Characteristic of or commonly pertaining to persons or things of low degree; common; inferior; poor; shabby: as, a mean appearance; mean dress.

He chanc'd to meet his deposed Brother, wandering in mean condition. Milton, Hist. Eng., i.

I know not what entertainment they [other seamen] had; but mine was like to be but mean, and therefore I presently left it. Dampier, Voyages, II. i. 55.

4. Without dignity of mind; destitute of honor; low-minded; spiritless; base.

The mean man's actions, be they good or evil, they reach not far. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 18.

Till I well could weep for a time so sordid and mean.
Tennyson, Maud, v. 2.

5. Niggardly; penurious; miserly; stingy. — 6. Of little value or account; low in worth or estimation; worthy of little or no regard; contemptible; despicable.

The meter and verse of Plautus and Terence be verie meane. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 144.

But Paul said, I am . . . a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city. Acts xxi. 39.

The French esteem him [the chub] so mean as to call him Un Villain. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 66.

7. Disobliging; pettily offensive or unaccommodating; "small." [Colloq.] — To feel mean, to feel that one has been guilty of some petty act; feel that one has not been generous, honorable, etc. [Colloq.] = Syn. 2. Vulgar, etc. (see common), humble, poor, servile. — 4. Abject, Low, etc. (see abject), paltry. See list under low[2]. — 5. Niggardly, Stingy, etc. (see penurious); sordid, selfish, close.

★mean[3] (mēn), a. and n. [< ME. meene, mēne, < OF. meien, moien, F. moyen = Pr. meian = Sp. Pg. mediano = It. mezzano, mean, < L. medianus, that is in the middle, middle, < medius, middle: see medium and mid[1]. Cf. median and mizzen, doublets of mean[3].] I. a. 1. Occupying a middle position; midway between two extremes; median: now chiefly in certain technical uses. See phrases below.

Ther ben none other mene weyes newe.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 286.

2. Of medium size, extent, etc.; medium, middling, or moderate.

In their eares [the women] weare eare-rings of the forme and bignesse of a meane Candle.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 837.

These faunes are of a meane price, For a man may buy one of the fairest of them for so much money as countervaileth our English groate. Coryat, Crudities, I. 135.

The first tidings of Vicary (who was probably born between 1490 and 1500) are, that he was "a meane practiser (had a moderate practise) at Maidstone," and was not a trained Surgeon. Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 42.

3. Coming between two events or points of time; intervening; intermediate: only in the phrase in the mean time or while.

In the meene while lete vs geder oure kyn and oure frendes and sowderes out of alle londes, and lete vs yeve hem bateile as soone as we may be assembled.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 174.

In the mean while his disciples prayed him, saying, Master, eat. John iv. 31.

4. Intermediate in a number of greater and less values, quantities, or amounts; forming an average between two or more terms of any kind; average; specifically, in math., having a value which is a symmetrical function of other values of the same sort, such that, were all those other values to be equal, the value of the function would be equal to them all (compare II., 4): as, the mean breadth of a country; the mean distance of the earth from the sun.

Those constitutions which can bear in open day the rough dealing of the world must be of that mean and average structure — such as iron and salt, atmospheric air and water. Emerson, Society and Solitude.

Center of mean distances. See center[1].—Focus of mean motion. See focus.—Mean anomaly. See anomaly, 2.—Mean apogee. See apogee, 1.—Mean clef, in musical notation, the C clef, because once specially used for the mean or middle voices.—Mean distance, ecliptic, effort. See the nouns.—Mean error. See error, 5.—Mean line, in crystal., a bisectrix: the first mean line is the acute, the second mean line the obtuse bisectrix.—Mean longitude of the sun, moon, or a planet, in astron., the celestial longitude which the body would have at any moment if, starting from perihelion, it moved in its orbit with a uniform angular velocity, completing its revolution in the same time it actually employs in making the circuit. The mean and true longitudes agree therefore at perihelion and aphelion.—Mean moon, an imaginary moon, supposed to move with an equable motion in the ecliptic, and in the same period as that which the real moon takes to perform a revolution with an unequable motion.—Mean noon, the moment when the mean sun passes the meridian.—Mean place, in logic, a place which partly agrees with the nature of the things to be proved, and partly differs from the same. The mean places are conjugates, cases, and divisions.—Mean position, in fencing, a position of the wrist midway between pronation and supination, with the thumb above the fingers. Rolando (ed. Forsyth).—Mean proportional, the second of any three quantities in continued proportion.—Mean solar day. See day[1], 3.—Mean space†, meanwhile.

Mean space entreate our freinds not to be too bussie in answering matters, before they know them.
Cushman, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 55.

Mean sun, in astron., an imaginary or fictitious sun, moving uniformly in the celestial equator, and having its right ascension always equal to the sun's mean longitude. Its hour-angle at any moment defines the mean time or clock-time, just as the hour-angle of the actual sun defines the apparent or sun-dial time. The use of the mean sun in time-reckoning is necessitated by the fact that, owing to the eccentricity of the earth's orbit and the inclination of the equator to the ecliptic, the sun's real motion in right ascension is seriously variable, and the days, hours, etc., of apparent solar time have, therefore, no fixed length. See day[1], 3.—Mean term, in logic, same as middle term (which see, under middle).—Mean time, a system of reckoning time, such that all the days and their like subdivisions are of equal length, its day being the mean interval between the two successive passages of the sun over the meridian of any place. The mean time at any moment may be defined as the hour-angle of the mean sun at that moment. (See mean sun.) Mean time is the time usually employed for civil and scientific purposes, and is the time indicated by an ordinary clock or watch, properly regulated. Apparent time is that indicated by a correctly adjusted sun-dial; the difference between the mean and the apparent time at any moment is called the equation of time, and sometimes slightly exceeds a quarter of an hour.—Mean voice, in music, a voice or voice-part intermediate between the highest and the lowest, as a tenor or an alto.—Mean way†, meantime.

In the meane way they [Lerius and his fellows] passed by the Tapemiry Paraibæ, Ouetacates, all which, howsoeuer they exercise hostilities and mutuall disagreements, yet agree in like barbarous and rightlesse Rites.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 837.

To cut a line in extreme and mean ratio. See extreme.—Syn. See II.

II. n. 1. The middle point, place, or state between two extremes; a middle path or course; a middle or intermediate kind, quality, rate, or degree; hence, the avoidance of extremes; absence of excess; moderation.

Ocupye the meene by stydefast strengthes, for al that ever is undir the meene or elles al that overpassith the meene despisith welefulnesse.
Chaucer, Boëthius, iv. prose 7.

There is no mean; either we depart from God and stick to the devil, or depart from the devil and stick to God.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 52.

'Tis a sin against
The state of princes to exceed a mean
In mourning for the dead.
Ford, Love's Sacrifice, i. 1.

We shall hold the immutable mean that lies between insensibility and anguish.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, vii.

The happy mean between these two extremes.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

2†. Intervening time; interval of time; interim; meantime.

Reserve her cause to her eternall doome;
And, in the meane, vouchsafe her honorable toombe.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 58.

3. In music: (a) A middle voice or voice-part, as the tenor or alto.

Thi organys so hihe begynne to syng ther mess,
With treble meene and tenor discordyng as I gesse.
Lydgate, Minor Poems, p. 54. (Halliwell.)

Your change of notes, the flat, the mean, the sharp.
B. Jonson, Underwoods, xcviii.

(b) The second of a set of viols; an alto.

Their chiefe instruments are Rattles made of small gourds, or Pumpeons shels. Of these they haue Base, Tenor, Countertenor, Meane, and Treble.
Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 136.

(c) Either the second or the third string of a viol, the former being the small mean, and the latter the great mean.—4. A quantity having a value intermediate between the values of other quantities; specifically, in math., the average, or arithmetical mean, obtained by adding several quantities together and dividing the sum by their number. In general a mean is a quantity which depends upon certain other quantities according to any law which conforms to these two conditions: first, that, if the quantities which determine the mean should all be equal, the mean would be equal to any one of them; and second, that no transposition of the values of the determining quantities among themselves can alter the value of the mean. (See geometrical mean, below.) The ancients recognized ten kinds of mean (μεσότης, medietas), distinguished by ordinal numbers, to which Jordanus Nemorarius added an eleventh. Only the first four, the arithmetical, geometrical, harmonical, and contraharmonical, are true means.

5. In logic, the middle term in a syllogism.—6†. A mediator; an intermediary; an agent; a broker; a go-between.

Thogh that our hertes stierne ben and stoute,
Thow to thy Sone canst be swich a mene
That alle our giltes he forgiveth clene.
Chaucer, Mother of God, l. 83.

For the am I becomen
Bytwyxen game and ernest, swich a meene
As maken wommen unto men to comen.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 254.

7. A subservient agency or instrumentality; that which confers ability or opportunity to attain an end: now rare in the singular, the plural form being used with both singular and plural meanings: as, means of travel or of subsistence; by this means you will succeed.

Be that meane the cite for to wynne.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 952.

Let me have open means to come to them.
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 2. 77.

By no manner of means, in no possible way; not in the least.—By no means, not at all; certainly not; not in any degree.—Center of the harmonic mean. See harmonic.—Contraharmonical mean and proportion. See contraharmonical.—Geometrical mean, the mean obtained by multiplying two quantities together and extracting the square root of the product. In general, the geometrical mean of n quantities is the nth root of their product.—Golden mean, in morals, moderation; the avoidance of extremes in either of two contrary ways.—Harmonic mean. See harmonic.—Means of grace. See grace.—Quadratic mean, the square root of the arithmetical mean of the squares of the given quantities.—To make means†, to take steps; find one's way.

We hauing made meanes for our speedie flight, as we were issuing foorth we were bewrayed by ye barking of a dog. Webbe, Travels, p. 28 (ed. Arber).

After she had been in prison three or four days, she made means to the governour, and submitted herself, and acknowledged her fault in disturbing the church.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 339.

=Syn. 1. Mean, Medium, Average, Mediocrity. Mean and medium represent the middle point or degree. Mean is much used in mathematics. (See arithmetical mean, geometrical mean, etc., above.) Mean is also much used in morals: as, in conduct we are to observe the golden mean; Aristotle held that each virtue was a mean between vice of defect and a vice of excess. Medium has this latter sense, but is used chiefly in matters of practical life: as, goods that are a medium between the best and the poorest; a color that is a medium between two others. In this sense medium is much used as an adjective: as, a medium grade, color, price. Means is the form of mean that corresponds to medium when it stands for that which, by being between others, is the agency for communication, etc. As mean and medium generally imply simply two extremes, but may imply several quantities of different amounts or degrees, so average may imply simply two extremes, but generally implies several quantities of different amounts or degrees: as, the average of 3, 5, 7, and 9 is 6. The latter word has similar figurative uses: as, the man's education was better than the average. Mediocrity is now used only in an unfavorable sense, implying blame or contempt: as, talents not above mediocrity —that is, very moderate.—7. Instrument, method, mode, way, expedient, resource, appliance.

mean[4]† (mēn), v. [< ME. menen, < AS. mǣnan, lament, moan: see moan, the present E. form. The AS. is often identified with mǣnan, mean, but the difference of meaning makes it necessary to treat it as a distinct word.] I. intrans. To moan; lament; mourn; complain.

Dem. And thus she meanes, videlicit:
This. Asleepe, my Loue? What, dead, my Doue?
O Piramus, arise! Shak., M. N. D., v. 1. 330 (folio 1623).

II. trans. To bemoan; lament: used reflexively.

Whanne i hade al me mened no more nold he seie
But "serteinly, swete damisele, that me sore rewes."
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 561.

mean[5]† (mēn), v. t. [An aphetic form of demean[1].] To demean; carry; conduct.

As good a gentleman born as thou art: nay, and better meaned. Marston, Jonson, and Chapman, Eastward Ho, i. 1.

★ measles (mē'zlz), n. [Early mod. E. also measels, meazles, meazels, measils, maisils, maysilles: rarely and erroneously in sing. (in sense 1), early mod. E. mesyll, masul, mazil; < ME. meseles, maseles, meselle, mesylle, measles (glossing ML. morbillus, serpedo, variola, OF. rugeroles), < MD. maselen, masselen, also maseren, masseren = G. masern, measles, lit. 'little spots' (cf. smallpox, orig. small pocks, 'little pustules'), pl. of MD. masel*, maschel = MLG. masele, massele, a spot, eruption, pustule, = OHG. masala, a bloody tumor, G. maser, a spot, speckle, as on wood or on the skin; dim. of MD. mase* = MLG. mase = OHG. māsa, MHG. māse, G. mase, a spot, the mark of a wound; whence also ult. mazer, a bowl orig. of spotted wood: see mazer. The word measles, ME. meseles, masales, is entirely distinct from ME. mesel, a leper, whence meselry, leprosy, but has been more or less confused with it, as in MD. masel-sucht, MLG. masel-, massel-, mesel-sucht, -suke, defined as "the measell-sicknesse" (Hexam), or measles, but prop. the 'leper-sickness,' or leprosy. The words mesel, meselry became nearly obsolete before the 17th century; in ME. the words were pronounced differently. Hence the equiv. measlings, q. v. The singular measle (def. 1, above) appears to have been developed from the plural (which is now used as singular), in the sense 'a spot like those of measles,' and not in the orig. lit. sense (in MD., etc.), of 'a little spot.'] 1. A contagious disease of man, with an incubation period of about nine or ten days, and a period of invasion of about three or four days, in which there are pyrexia and rapid pulse, inflammation of the mucous membrane of the eyes and upper air-passages, and bronchitis, followed by an eruption of small rose-colored papulæ, which arrange themselves in curvilinear forms. The period of eruption usually lasts about four days. The eruption is succeeded by a bran-like desquamation. The poison is conveyed directly from the patient through the air and by fomites. It is given off in the period of invasion as well as in later periods. Also called rubeola and morbilli.

So shall my lungs
Coin words till their decay against those measles,
Which we disdain should tetter us, yet sought
The very way to catch them. Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 78.

Petecchie [It.], the disease we call the Meazels or Gods marks. Florio.

With-oute of chaungyng of coloure or corage
Noo thyng in haste, but mesurably.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 60.

Wine measurably drunk and in season bringeth gladness of the heart. Ecclus. xxxi. 28.

★measure (mezh′ūr), n. [< ME. mesure, mesur, < OF. and F. mesure = Pr. mesura, mensura = Sp. mesura = Pg. mesura, mensura = It. misura, < L. mensura, a measuring, measure, a thing to measure by, < metiri, pp. mensus, measure: see mete[1].] 1. A unit or standard adopted to determine the linear dimensions, volume, or other quantity of other objects, by the comparison of them with it; a standard for the determination of a unit of reckoning. Measures of length are either line-measures or end-measures. Line-measures are objects having lines marked upon them, between which it is intended that the measurement shall be made; end-measures are objects (bars) between the ends of which it is intended that the measurement shall be made.

A perfect and just measure shalt thou have.
Deut. xxv. 15.

Who hath . . . comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure? Isa. xl. 12.

A tailor . . .
With his shears and measure in his hand.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2. 196.

Nothing then could serve well for a convenient measure of time but what has divided the whole length of its duration into apparently equal portions by constantly repeated periods. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xiv. 18.

2. Hence, any standard of comparison, estimation, or judgment.

But money may maken mesur of the peyne,
(After [according to] that his power is to payen) his penance schal faile.
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 571.

The natural measure whereby to judge our doings is the sentence of Reason. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 8.

Some, valuing those of their own side or mind,
Still make themselves the measure of mankind.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 453.

3. A system of measurement; a scheme of denominations or units of length, surface, volume, or the like: as, weights and measures; long measure, square measure, etc.

That he himself was skilled in weights and measures . . . there is no reason to doubt.
Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins.

4. The dimensions or extent of a thing as determined or determinable by comparison with a unit or standard; size; extent; capacity (literal or figurative); volume; duration; quantity in general.

Both the cherubims were of one measure and one size.
1 Ki. vi. 25.

Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days. Ps. xxxix. 4.

If else thou seek'st
Aught, not surpassing human measure, say.
Milton, P. L., vii. 640.

The elder Mirabeau . . . clearly enounced the doctrine that "the measure of subsistence is the measure of population." Amer. Anthropologist, I. 1.

It is possible to determine the forms of the planetary orbits, their positions, and their dimensions, in terms of the earth's mean distance from the sun as the unit of measure, with great precision.
Newcomb and Holden, Astronomy, p. 214.

5. An act of measurement or comparison with a standard of quantity, or a series of such acts: as, to make clothes to measure.

Even now a tailor call'd me in his shop, . . .
And therewithal took measure of my body.
Shak., C. of E., iv. 3. 9.

6. A definite quantity measured off or meted out: as, a measure of wine or meal. In some places, as applied to certain things, a measure is a known quantity, the word being used specifically. Thus, in England, a measure of corn is a Winchester bushel; in Connecticut, a measure of oysters is five quarts.

To-morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel. 2 Ki. vii. 1.

Be large in mirth; anon we'll drink a measure
The table round. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4. 11.

7. Used absolutely, a full or sufficient quantity. [Rare.]

I'll never pause again, never stand still,
Till either death hath closed these eyes of mine,
Or fortune given me measure of revenge.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 3. 32.

8. Quantity, amount, extent, or any dimension, as measured or meted out; the result of any mensural determination or rule: as, the measure of or for the beams is 10 feet 4 inches; full or short measure. In many technical uses measure has specific applications, according to the particular case involved. Thus, in printing, the measure of a line, page, or column is its width stated in ems.

Good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom.
Luke vi. 38.

9. Moderation; just degree or proportion; reasonable bounds or limits: as, beyond measure; within measure.

We should keep a measure in all things.
Latimer, Misc. Sel.

Measure is a merry mean, as this doth shew,
Not too high for the pye, nor too low for the crow.
Heywood's Proverbs (ed. 1562). (Hazlitt.)

There is a measure in everything.
Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 74.

10. Degree; proportion; indefinite quantity.

Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure. Ps. lxxx. 5.

If you will fish for a Carp, you must put on a very large measure of patience. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 145.

There is a great measure of discretion to be used in the performance of confession. Jer. Taylor.

It is not in human nature to deceive others for any long time without in a measure deceiving ourselves also.
J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 125.

11. In pros.: (a) Determination of rhythm by division into times or groups of times; rhythm, as so determined; meter. In ancient prosody the unit of measure is the primary time or mora. See mora[1]. (b) A group of times or syllables used to determine the length of a colon, period, or meter. In ancient prosody the measure was sometimes a single foot (monopody), and sometimes a pair of feet (dipody). Iambic, trochaic, and anapestic rhythms were as a rule measured by dipodies, other meters by monopodies. The measure was marked as such by beating time, the secondary ictus of a dipody not receiving the beat. According to the number of measures contained in it, a meter was designated as monometer, dimeter, trimeter, etc., and these terms are those still in use for modern poetry, some writers, however, counting every foot a measure.

Meeter and measure is all one, for what the Greekes call μετρον, the Latines call Mensura, and is but the quantitie of a verse, either long or short.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 55.

(c) A rhythmical period or meter, especially as determined by division into such groups; a rhythm, line, or verse.

Long, stately, and swelling measures, whose graver movement accords with a serious and elevated purpose.
E. C. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 93.

12. In music: (a) One of the groups of tones or of accents included between any two primary or heavy accents or beats. A measure always begins with such a primary accent, and includes one or two (or even more) secondary accents, with various possible lesser accents. Most rhythms may be reduced to measures having either one primary and one secondary accent or one primary and two secondary accents, the former rhythm being called duple and the latter triple. Measures are indicated in printed music by bars, one of which is placed before each primary accent. All the notes between two bars are said to belong to the same measure or bar. The essential structure of the measures in a given piece of music is indicated at the beginning by the rhythmical signature. See signature. (b) Same as tempo. [Rare.]—13. Any regulated or graceful motion; especially, motion adjusted to musical time.

Hath not my gait in it the measure of the court?
Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 757.

14. A slow, stately dance or dance-movement.

Wooing, wedding, and repenting is as a Scotch jig, a measure, and a cinque pace: the first suit is hot and hasty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding, mannerly-modest, as a measure, full of state and ancientry. Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 77.

My dancing—well, I know what our usher said to me last time I was at the school. Would I might have led Philautia in the measures!
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

He took her soft hand, ere her mother could bar—
"Now tread we a measure!" said young Lochinvar.
Scott, Marmion, v. 12.

15. A determinate action or procedure, intended as means to an end; anything devised or done with a view to the accomplishment of a purpose; specifically, in later use, any course of action proposed or adopted by a government, or a bill introduced into a legislature: as, measures (that is, a bill or bills) for the relief of the poor; a wise measure; rash measures.

That pride which many who presume to boast of their generous sentiments allow to regulate their measures has nothing nobler in view than the approbation of men.
Johnson, Rambler.

Measures, not men, have always been my mark.
Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, ii.

16. pl. In geol., a set or series of beds, as in coal-measures, the assemblage of strata in which the coal of any particular region occurs.—17. In fencing, the distance of one fencer from another at which the one can just reach the other by lunging. To come into measure is to approach an opponent near enough to reach him with the sword-tip by thrusting and lunging.—Above or beyond measure, to an indefinitely great degree or extent; exceedingly.

Martin having rejoiced above measure in the abundance of light. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 3.

Beyond measure I persecuted the church of God.
Gal. i. 13.

Absolute measure. See absolute.—Angular measure, the system of units employed for measuring angles. It is based on the measurement of the circumference of a circle described with the vertex of the angle as its center. The circumference is regarded as divided into 360 equal parts called degrees; a right angle is thus the angle subtended at the center by the fourth part of the circumference, or is 90 degrees. The table is:

60 seconds (60″)	= 1 minute (1′)
60 minutes	= 1 degree (1°)
360 degrees	= 1 circle or circumference.

Apothecaries' measure, the system of units employed by apothecaries in compounding and dispensing liquid drugs. The table in use in the United States is:

Gallon.		Pints.		Fluidounces.		Fluidrachms.		Minims.
1	=	8	=	128	=	1024	=	61440
		1	=	16	=	128	=	7680
				1	=	8	=	480
						1	=	60

The capacity of the gallon is 231 cubic inches. The pint of the British Pharmacopœia (being the eighth part of the gallon of 277.274 cubic inches) is divided into 20 fluidounces, with the fluidrachm and minim constituting the same subdivisions of the fluidounce as in the above table. The cubic capacity of the gallon can, however, be stated only approximately. The standards are made to contain a certain weight of water at a certain temperature. See gallon.—Barren measures. See barren.—Binary measure. See binary.—Cartesian measure of force. See Cartesian.—Circular measure. (a) A system of measurement used in trigonometry, in which the unit is the angle subtended by an arc equal in length to the radius—namely, 57° 17′ 44″.8+. (b) Same as angular measure.—Cloth-measure, the standard system of lineal units employed in measuring cloth. The table is:

Yard.		Quarters.		Nails.		Inches.
1	=	4	=	16	=	36
		1	=	4	=	9
				1	=	2¼

The English ell is 5 quarters, and the Flemish ell about 3 quarters. See *ell*1.—Common measure. See common.—Compound measure. See *compound*1.—Cubic measure, the system of units employed for measuring volume, formed from long measure by taking the cubes of the lineal dimensions. The table is:

Cubic yard.		Cubic feet.		Cubic inches.
1	=	27	=	46656
		1	=	1728

Decimal measure. See decimal.—Dry measure, the system of units ordinarily used in measuring dry commodities, such as grain, fruit, etc. The table is:

Quarter.		Bushels.		Pecks.		Gallons.		Quarts.		Pints.
1	=	8	=	32	=	64	=	256	=	512
		1	=	4	=	8	=	32	=	64
				1	=	2	=	8	=	16
						1	=	4	=	8
								1	=	2

A pottle is 2 quarts; a load of grain is 5 quarters, and a last 10 quarters. The approximate capacity of the imperial (British legal) bushel is 2,218.192 cubic inches; of the Winchester (United States legal) bushel, 2,150.42 cubic inches. (See apothecaries' measure.) The United States bushel is thus equivalent to .96946 British bushel.—Gravitation measure of force. See gravitation.—Greatest common measure of two or more numbers or quantities, the greatest number or quantity which divides each of them without a remainder.—Heaped measure. See heap, v. t.—Imperfect measure. See imperfect.—In a measure, to some extent.—Lineal or linear measure. See long measure, below.—Liquid measure, the system of units ordinarily used in measuring liquids. The table is:

Gallon.		Quarts.		Pints.		Gills.
1	=	4	=	8	=	32
		1	=	2	=	8
				1	=	4

For the capacity of the gallon, see apothecaries' measure.—Long measure, lineal or linear measure, the system of units ordinarily used in measuring length. The table is:

Mile.		Furlongs.		Poles, Rods, or Perches.		Yards.		Feet.		Inches.
1	=	8	=	320	=	1760	=	5280	=	63360
		1	=	40	=	220	=	660	=	7920
				1	=	5½	=	16½	=	198
						1	=	3	=	36
								1	=	12

Other units considered as belonging to long measure are the pace, 5 feet; the fathom, 6 feet; the span, 9 inches; the hand (used in measuring the height of horses), 4 inches; the surveyors' chain or Gunter's chain, of 100 links, 66 feet; the engineers' chain, of 100 links (United States), 100 feet (see link). See also cloth-measure, above.—Measure of a number or quantity, in math., a number which is exactly contained in another two or more times.—Measure of a ratio, its logarithm in any system of logarithms, or the exponent of the power to which the ratio is equal, the exponent of some given ratio being assumed as unity. See ratio.—Measure of capacity, dry or liquid measure.—Measure of curvature. See curvature.—Measure of solidity. Same as cubic measure.—Metric measures. See metric system, under *metric*3.—Net measure. See net.—Out of measure, out of proportion; disproportionately; immoderately; excessively.

And his Lond durethe in very brede 4 Monethes iorneyes and in lengthe out of measure.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 277.

He saith they [Brazilians] liue 150 yeares, and that their women are out of measure luxurious.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 836.

Small measure, in some parts of the United States, a measure containing a quarter of a peck, used especially in marketing for dry vegetables.—Square measure, the ordinary system of units for measuring and expressing areas, including the acre and rood and the squares of the units of the ordinary long measure. (See land-measure.) The acre is 10 square chains, or 100,000 square links.—To take the measure of, to observe narrowly so as to form a judgment concerning.—Winchester measure. See *bushel*1, 1.—Within measure, within bounds.—With measure†, fully.

He cannot but with measure fit the honours Which we devise him. Shak., Cor., ii. 2. 127.

measure (mezh′ūr), v.; pret. and pp. measured, ppr. measuring. [< ME. mesuren, < OF. (and F.) mesurer = Pr. Sp. mesurar = Pg. mensurar, mesurar = It. misurare, < L. mensurare, measure, < mensura, measure: see measure, n. Cf. mensuration.] I. trans. 1. To ascertain the length, extent, dimensions, quantity, or capacity of by comparison with a standard; ascertain or determine a quantity by exact observation. To measure a length, a standard of length is employed; this is laid down so that its beginning coincides with the beginning of the length to be measured, and its other end is marked; it is then laid down again in the same way, with its first end where its last end previously came, and so on, counting the number of times it is laid down. Finally, if there remains a length less than that of the standard, this is measured by subdividing the length of the standard into a sufficient number of equal parts, and using one of these as a secondary standard. Measurements are also effected by reference to units of area or of capacity, as well as by means of weighing, etc.

In londes mesuring yit craftes are.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 47.

Suppose that we take two stations situated north and south of each other, determine the latitude of each, and measure the distance between them.
Newcomb and Holden, Astronomy, p. 201.

2. To serve as the measure of; be adequate to express the size of: often used figuratively.

An ell and three quarters will not measure her from hip to hip. Shak., C. of E., iii. 2. 113.

3. To estimate or determine the relative extent, greatness, or value of; appraise by comparison with something else: with by before the standard of comparison.

In all which the king measured and valued things amisse, as afterwards appeared. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 45.

Who is ther almost that measures wisdom by simplicity, strength by suffering, dignity by lowliness?
Milton, Church-Government, ii. 1.

Measuring merit by adventitious circumstances of greatness. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

4. To bring into comparison or competition; oppose or set against as equal or as a test of equality: with with.

Their pleasaunt tunes they sweetly thus applyde; . . .
With that the rolling sea . . . them fitly answered;
And on the rocke the waves breaking aloft
A solemn Meane [tenor] unto them measured.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 33.

All start at once: Oïleus led the race;
The next Ulysses, measuring pace with pace.
Pope, Iliad, xxiii. 888.

He was compelled to measure his genius with that of the greatest captain of the age.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 14.

5. To pass over or through.

Thou hast measured much grownd,
And wandred, I wene, about the world round.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

We must measure twenty miles to-day.
Shak., M. of V., iii. 4. 84.

6. To adjust; proportion; suit; accommodate.

To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, not your fortunes by your desires.
Jer. Taylor.

7†. To control; regulate.

The philosophre . . . him betecheth
The lore, howe that he shall measure
His bodie, so that no measure
Of fleshly lust he shulde excede.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

8. To allot or distribute by measure; apportion; mete: often with out.

With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Mat. vii. 2.

Of Eight great Hours, Time measures out the Sands;
And Europe's Fate in doubtful Balance stands.
Prior, Letter to Boileau Despreaux, 1704.

What thou seest is that portion of eternity called time, measured out by the sun. Addison, Spectator, No. 159.

To measure one's length, to fall or be thrown down at full length; lie or be laid prostrate.

If you will measure your lubber's length again, tarry: but away! Shak., Lear, i. 4. 100.

To measure strength, to ascertain by trial which of two parties is the stronger; specifically, to engage in a contest.—To measure swords, to fight with swords.

Miss Tattle, who was by, affirmed . . . that Sir H. Boquet and Tom Saunter were to measure swords on a similar provocation. Sheridan, School for Scandal, i. 1.

II. intrans. 1. To take a measurement or measurements.—2. To be of a (specified) measure; give a specified result on being compared with a standard: as, a board measures ten feet.—Measuring cast. See *cast*1.

measured (mezh′ūrd), p. a. 1. Definitely ascertained or determined by measurement or rule; set off or laid down by measurement; adjusted or proportioned by rule.

A positive and measured truth.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

The rest, no portion left
That may disgrace his art, or disappoint
Large expectation, he disposes neat
At measured distances. Cowper, Task, iii. 24.

2. Characterized by uniformity of movement or rhythm; rhythmical; stately; formal; deliberate: as, to walk with measured tread.

His voice was clear, but not agreeable; his enunciation measured and precise. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 25.

3. Limited or restricted; within bounds; moderate: as, to speak in no measured terms.—Measured music. See mensurable, 2.

measuredly (mezh′ūrd-li), adv. Deliberately. [Rare.]

Measuredly came the words from her lips.
R. Broughton, Cometh up as a Flower, xii.

measureless (mezh′ūr-les), a. [< measure + -less.] Without measure; unlimited; immeasurable.

What, sir, not yet at rest? The king 's a-bed . . . and shut up In measureless content. Shak., Macbeth, ii. 1. 17.

measurelessness (mezh′ūr-les-nes), n. The state or quality of being unmeasured, or incapable of being measured; immoderateness. George Eliot.

measurely† (mezh′ūr-li), adv. [< measure + *-ly*2.] Moderately.

Yet measurely feasting, with neighbours among,
Shall make thee beloved, and live the more long.
Tusser, Good Husbandly Lessons, x.

measurement (mezh′ūr-ment), n. [< measure + -ment.] 1. The act of measuring; mensuration.

The exact length of any aliquot part of it [the circle], such as 1°, . . . is not beyond the limits of very exact measurement. Herschel, Outlines of Astron. (1858), § 209.

All must determine the distance of the moon as well as that of the sun to be able to complete our map on a known scale of measurement.
Newcomb and Holden, Astronomy, p. 216.

2. A system of measuring or measures: as, builders' measurement.—3. An ascertained dimension; the length, breadth, thickness, depth, extent, quantity, capacity, etc., of a thing as determined or determinable by measuring; size, bulk, area, or contents.—Builders' measurement, a method of computing the tonnage of merchant vessels in use among ship-builders. Its results are nearly double the legal or registered tonnage.—Measurement goods, light goods which are charged for carriage by the bulk of the packages, as distinguished from heavy goods, which are charged by weight.—New measurement, a more accurate method than that formerly in use of arriving at the cubical capacity of a ship available for stowing cargo. The model of the ship affects the comparison of tonnage with the old measurement, it varying very largely. The new measurement superseded the old by act of Congress about 1884. See tonnage.—Units of measurement. See unit.

measure-moth (mezh′ūr-môth), n. A geometrid or looper. See looper, 2.

measurer (mezh′ūr-ėr), n. One who or that which measures.

The world's bright eye, Time's measurer, begun
Through watery Capricorn his course to run.
Howell, Poem-Royal to His Majesty, Jan., 1641.

Specifically—(a) One whose occupation or duty it is to measure land, commodities in market, etc. (b) One who measures work on a building as a basis for contractors' prices. (c) Formerly, an officer in the city of London who measured woolen cloths, coals, etc. Also called a meter. See alnager. (d) An instrument or apparatus used in measuring. (e) In entom., a measuring-worm.

measuring-chain (mezh′ūr-ing-chān), n. The surveyors' chain, containing 100 links of 7.92 inches each (Gunter's chain), or 100 links of 1 foot each. See chain and link.

measuring-faucet (mezh′ūr-ing-fâ″set), n. A faucet, or a contrivance performing the functions of a faucet, designed to measure the amount of a liquid passing through it. Such faucets are used in delivering liquids in bulk, in putting them up in cans, etc.

measuring-funnel (mezh′ūr-ing-fun″el), n. A funnel with a valve to close the nozle, fitted with a graduated scale indicating the quantity of liquid contained in it.

measuring-glass (mezh′ūr-ing-glȧs), n. A graduated glass vessel used by chemists, pharmacists, and others for measuring fluids.

measuring-line (mezh′ūr-ing-līn), n. A line used for measuring lengths.

measuring-machine (mezh′ūr-ing-ma-shēn″), n. A device for the exact determination of length or end-measurement. Such instruments usually consist of a metallic bed-piece with a head-stock at each end, of sliding bars which in shape are true rectangular parallelepipeds, and of a combination of two or more accurate micrometer-screws, attached to the head-stocks, and driven by graduated wheels so as to advance or retract the bars, which slide in a groove between the head-stocks.

measuring-pump (mezh′ūr-ing-pump), n. A pump used for measuring liquids. Each stroke delivers the same volume, and the strokes are counted, or the pump-rod is connected with registering mechanism adjusted to indicate the number of strokes or the total volume discharged.

measuring-tape (mezh′ūr-ing-tāp), n. A tape-measure or tape-line.

measuring-wheel (mezh′ūr-ing-hwēl), n. A small wheel of known circumference, fitted by its axis to a handle, used to measure the circumference of round bodies, as that of a carriage-wheel when the tire is to be fitted; a circumferentor or tire-measurer.

measuring-worm (mezh′ūr-ing-wėrm), n. The larva of any geometrid moth; a looper: so called from its mode of progression: same as geometer, 3. See cut under Cidaria.

meat[1] (mēt), n. [< ME. mete, < AS. mete = OS. meti, mat = OFries. mete, meit, met = MD. mete, D. met = MLG. met, LG. met, mett = OHG. MHG. maz, G. mass, in comp. massleid, aversion to food, = Icel. matr, also mata = Sw. mat = Dan. mad = Goth. mats, food; root uncertain; perhaps orig. 'a portion dealt out,' < AS. metan (pret. mæt), etc., measure: see mete[1]. Otherwise, perhaps cognate with L. mandere, chew: see manducate, mange[1].] 1. Food in general; nourishment of any kind. [Obsolete, archaic, or local.]

The Camaylle fynt alle wey Mete in Trees and on Busshes, that he fedethe him with. Mandeville, Travels, p. 58.

Blysful was the fyrst age of men: they heldyn hem apayed with the metes that the trewe feeldes browhten forth. Chaucer, Boëthius, ii. meter 5.

And the same John had his raiment of camel's hair, . . . and his meat was locusts and wild honey. Mat. iii. 4.

The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer. Prov. xxx. 25.

2. Solid food of any kind: as, meat and drink.

With abstynence of drynk and litel mete
After this feste as fede hem daies three.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 153.

I have fed you with milk, and not with meat, for hitherto ye were not able to bear it. 1 Cor. iii. 2.

Shall I not take care of all that I think,
Yea, ev'n of wretched meat and drink?
Tennyson, Maud, xv.

3. The flesh of warm-blooded animals ordinarily killed for food; butcher-meat; flesh-meat: as, to abstain from meat but eat fish on Friday: in a narrower sense, the flesh of mammals used for food: as, to prefer meat to fowl or fish; bear-meat; deer-meat.

I smell the smell of roasting meat,
I hear the hissing fry. O. W. Holmes.

4. The edible part of something: as, the meat of an egg, of a nut, or of a shell-fish: sometimes with a plural: as, the meats of nuts or of oysters.

After I have cut the egg i' the middle, and eat up the meat. Shak., Lear, i. 4. 174.

5. The taking of food or a meal; the act of eating meat, in the original sense of the word: as, grace before meat.

Till it come to the mete tyme that the kynge made the Duke of Tintagel to be set before hym-self.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 64.

He 's within at meat, sir:
The knave is hungry.
Fletcher, Pilgrim, ii. 2.

The ingenious English tourists who visit the United States from time to time find us silent over our meat.
Howells, Venetian Life, vi.

6†. Dinner.

After the sondry sesouns of the yeer
So chaungede he his mete and his soper.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 348.

The kynge Arthur hym asked whan that was don, and he seide, "Seth yesterday after mete."
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 623.

7. An animal or animals collectively, as used or hunted for food: as, to kill meat for an exploring party. [Local.] — A meal's meat. See meal[2]. — Broken meat. See broken. — Butchers' meat. See butcher-meat. — Dark meat, that part of the flesh of some fowls which when cooked is not white or light, particularly the thighs and legs of turkeys. — Light meat, the flesh of the breast and wings of various fowls which when cooked is of a whitish color. Fowls which have light meat are the varieties of the domestic hen, the turkey, various grouse, as the ruffed, many partridges, as the bobwhite, etc. It is perhaps confined to the gallinaceous order of birds. Also called white meat. — Red meat, meat which is ordinarily served underdone, or preferred to be eaten rare, as beef, mutton, venison, canvasback, etc. — To be meat for one's master, to be too good for one.

Away, you mouldy rogue, away! I am meat for your master. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4. 135.

To hang up meat. See hang. — White meat. (a) Same as light meat. (b) Meat which must be well cooked, leaving no trace of bloodiness, as veal.

meat[1] (mēt), v. t. [Cf. Goth. matjan, eat, devour; from the noun: see meat[1], n.] To supply with food; feed. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

Strong oxen and horses, wel shod and wel clad,
Wel meated and used. Tusser, September's Husbandry.

Haste then, and meate your men, though I must still say
My command would lead them fasting forth.
Chapman, Iliad, xix. 196.

meat[2]†, v. An obsolete spelling of meet[1].

meatal (mē-ā′tal), a. [< meatus + -al.] Of or pertaining to a meatus; having the character of a meatus.

In the hare the meatal part of the tympanic is long, and ascends obliquely backward from the frame of the drum-membrane. Owen, Anat.

meat-chopper (mēt′chop″ėr), n. Any device for chopping or mincing meats.

meat-earth (mēt′ėrth), n. Soil. [Prov. Eng.]

The upper part of this [overburden] consists of soil, or meat earth. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 638.

meated (mē′ted), a. Having meat or a fleshy part (of a specified kind): used in composition: as, a sweet-meated nut; light-meated or dark-meated fowls.

meat-fly (mēt′flī), n. A flesh-fly or blow-fly; a dipterous insect which lays its eggs on meat, on which the larvæ feed: applied to various species, especially Calliphora vomitoria and Sarcophaga carnaria. See cut under flesh-fly.

meat-form†, n. [ME. mete-forme; < meat[1] + form.] A form or long seat on which to sit at table.

And whenne his swerde brokene was,
A mete-forme he gatt percas,
And there-with he ganne hym were.
MS. Lincoln A. i. 17, f. 105. (Halliwell.)

meath† (mēth), n. Same as mead[1].

meat-hunter (mēt′hun″tėr), n. Same as pot-hunter, 1.

The meat-hunters are still devoting their attention to the killing of larger game; but, as it decreases, the deer's turn will surely come. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 878.

meatiness (mē′ti-nes), n. The state or quality of being meaty, in any sense; fleshiness; pithiness: as, the meatiness of an ox, or of a discourse.

meatless (mēt′les), a. [ME. meteles, < AS. meteleás (= Icel. matlauss), without food, < mete, food, + -léas, E. -less: see meat[1] and -less.] Destitute of meat; without food.

Thre dawes and thre nygt meteles hii wuste hem so,
That hii nuste hou on take, ne wat vor hunger do.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 170.

Growling over his unenvied virtue as a cur growls over a meatless bone. G. H. Lewes, Hist. Philos., I. 194.

meat-maggot (mēt′ma″got), n. The larva of the flesh-fly, Calliphora vomitoria, found in meat.

meat-offering (mēt′of″ėr-ing), n. A Jewish sacrificial offering, constituting a part of the daily service of the altar or of special services, consisting of fine flour either raw or baked without leaven but with salt, or of dried or parched and pounded corn of the first-fruits, etc., with fine oil and frankincense. See Lev. ii. and vi. 14–23, etc. In the revised version rendered meal-offering.

meatometer (mē-ą-tom′e-tėr), n. [< L. meatus (see meatus) + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the meatus urinarius.

meat-pie (mēt′pī), n. 1. A pie made of meat or flesh.—2. A mince-pie. [Local, New Eng.]

meatrife (mēt′rīf), a. [< meat[1] + rife.] Abounding with food; plentifully supplied with food. [Scotch.]

The mill it is a meatrif place.
Robin Hood and the Beggar (Child's Ballads, V. 202).

meat-safe (mēt′sāf), n. A cupboard or chest in which to keep meat, made with walls of wire gauze or perforated zinc.

meat-saw (mēt′sâ), n. A saw used by butchers, having a thin, narrow blade fastened in an iron frame or bow, which gives it rigidity.

meat-tea (mēt′tē), n. A tea at which flesh-meat is furnished; a high tea (which see, under high). [Vulgar.]

A good hearty meat-tea being the usual premier pas in amatory matters. G. A. Sala, Baddington Peerage, I. 120.

meatus (mē-ā′tus), n.; pl. meatus, sometimes, as English, meatuses. [< L. meatus, a passage, < meare, go. Cf. conge[1], permeate.] In anat., a passage: applied to various ducts of the body. — Inferior meatus (of the nose), the passage in the nose between the inferior turbinate bone and the floor of the nasal cavity. Also called meatus ventralis. — Meatus acusticus. See meatus auditorius. — Meatus auditorius externus, the external opening of the ear, closed at the bottom by the membrana tympani. Also called meatus acusticus externus. — Meatus auditorius internus, the passage in the petrous bone by which the auditory and facial nerves leave the cranial cavity. Also called meatus acusticus internus. — Meatus cysticus, the gall-duct. — Meatus urinarius, the external orifice of the urethra. — Meatus venosus, the short trunk formed by the union of the right and left vitelline or omphalomesenteric veins in the fetus. — Meatus ventralis, the inferior nasal meatus. — Middle meatus (of the nose), the passage in the nose between the inferior turbinate part of the ethmoid bone and the inferior turbinate bone. — Nasal meatus (pl.), the nasal passages between and below the turbinated parts of the ethmoid and the inferior turbinate bones. — Superior meatus (of the nose), the passage in the nose between the turbinate parts (superior and inferior) of the ethmoid bone.

meaty (mē′ti), a. [< meat[1] + -y[1].] 1. Abounding in meat; fleshy: as, meaty cattle.—2. Resembling meat, or characteristic of it: as, a meaty flavor.—3. Figuratively, pithy; full of meaning or significance; condensed, as a treatise giving much information in small compass.

I think any discussion of it [practice and theory in esthetics] would be likely to be rather more meaty than the inane speculations about the nature of the Beautiful and Sublime which fill so many pages of text-books on æsthetics. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 105.

meaw†. An obsolete spelling of mew[1], mew[2].

meazel, n. See measle.

meazle†, v. i. See mistle, mizzle[1].

mebbe (meb′ē), adv. A dialectal form of maybe.

meble†, a. and n. See moble[1].

mecate (me-kä′te), n. [Nahuatl mecatl.] 1. A Mexican and Central American measure, given as 24 varas in Honduras.—2. A rope made of hair or of the fiber of the maguey.

Mecca balsam. Same as balm of Gilead.

Meccan (mek′an), a. and n. [< Mecca (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Pertaining or relating to Mecca, a city of Arabia, the birthplace of Mohammed, and the chief holy city and pilgrim resort of the Mohammedan world.

Only about one-third of the Meccan pilgrims proceed thither [to the tomb of Mohammed at Medina].
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 93.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Mecca.

mech. An abbreviation of mechanics and mechanical.

mechalt (mē′kal), a. [Early mod. E. mechall, michall; < L. mœchus, < Gr. μοιχός, an adulterer.] Adulterous.

That done, straight murder
One of thy basest Groomes, and lay you both Grasp'd arme in arme on thy adulterate bed,
Then call in witness of that mechall sinne.
T. Heywood, Rape of Lucrece.

mecha-meck (mech′ą-mek), n. [Amer. Ind.?] The wild potato-vine. See Ipomœa.

mechanic (mē-kan′ik), a. and n. [< ME. mechanike, mechanic art; < OF. mecanique, F. mécanique = Pr. mechanic = Sp. mecánico = Pg. mechanico = It. meccanico (cf. D. G. mechanisch = Sw. Dan. mekanisk), < L. mechanicus, of or belonging to machines or mechanics, inventive; as a noun, mechanicus, m., a mechanic, mechanica, f., mechanics; < Gr. μηχανικός, pertaining to machines or contrivance, mechanic, ingenious, inventive; as a noun, μηχανικός, an engineer, μηχανική, f. sing., μηχανικά, neut. pl., mechanics; < μηχανή (> L. machina), a machine, contrivance: see machine. Mechanic is thus ult. the adj. to machine; but the words came into E. at different times and under different circumstances.] I. a. 1. Same as mechanical: now used chiefly in the phrase the mechanic arts.

Thrust some mechanic cause into his [God's] place,
Or bind in matter, or diffuse in space.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 471.

But he [Pope] (his musical finesse was such,
So nice his ear, so delicate his touch)
Made poetry a mere mechanic art.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 654.

Must sleepy bards the flattering dream prolong,
Mechanic echoes of the Mantuan song?
Crabbe, Works, I. 4.

2†. Belonging to or characteristic of the class of mechanics; common; vulgar; mean.

The poor mechanic porters crowding in Their heavy burdens at his narrow gate.
Shak., Hen. V., i. 2. 200.

3. Supporting the atomistic philosophy.

These mechanic philosophers being no way able to give an account thereof [of the formation and organization of the bodies of animals] from the necessary motion of matter. Ray, Works of Creation, i.

II. n. 1†. Mechanic art; mechanics.

Of hem that ben artificers,
Whiche vsen craftes and misters,
Whose arte is cleped mechanike.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

2†. Mechanism; structure.

The fault being in the very frame and mechanic of the part. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 194.

3. A maker of machines or machinery; hence, any skilled worker with tools; one who has learned a trade; a workman whose occupation consists in the systematic manipulation and constructive shaping or application of materials; an artificer, artisan, or craftsman. To many persons whose business is partly mechanical the term mechanic is inapplicable, as farmers, surgeons, and artists. It implies special training, and is therefore inapplicable to unskilled laborers, though they may be engaged in constructive work.

An art quite lost with our mechanicks, a work not to be made out, but like the walls of Thebes, and such an artificer as Amphion. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 18.

Some plain mechanic, who, without pretence
To birth or wit, nor gives nor takes offence.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 449.

4. One who works mechanically; one who follows routine or rule in an occupation requiring careful thought or study: used opprobriously: as, a mere literary mechanic; the picture shows the artist to be only a mechanic.—Mechanics' institute, an institution for the instruction and recreation of artisans and others of similar grade, by means of lectures, a library, museum, courses of lessons, etc.—Mechanic's lien. See lien[2].

mechanical (mē-kan'i-kal), a. and n. [< mechanic + -al.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or exhibiting constructive power; of or pertaining to mechanism or machinery; also, dependent upon the use of mechanism; of the nature or character of a machine or machinery: as, mechanical inventions or contrivances; to do something by mechanical means.

Arts mechanical contract brotherhoods in commonalties. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 116.

2. Machine-like; acting or actuated by or as if by machinery, or by fixed routine; lacking spontaneity, spirit, individuality, etc.; as applied to actions, automatic, instinctive, unconscious, etc.: as, the mechanical action of the heart; a mechanical musician.

Any man with eyes and hands may be taught to take a likeness. The process, up to a certain point, is merely mechanical. Macaulay, History.

I call that part of mental and bodily life mechanical which is independent of our volition.
O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 261.

Human action is either mechanical or intelligent, either conventional or rational.
J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 166.

3. Having the characteristics of that which is produced by machinery or is artificially contrived; artificial; not spontaneous; not genuine or of natural growth; lacking life or spirit; humdrum.

None of these men of mechanical courage have ever made any great figure in the profession of arms.
Steele, Spectator, No. 152.

I always thought fit to keep up some mechanical forms of good breeding, without which freedom ever destroys friendship. Goldsmith, Vicar, iv.

It is the limitation to rigid instruments already prepared, and to an external connection between them, that gives mechanical work that uncanny appearance which causes us to feel most repugnance to a comparison of it with life. Lotze, Microcosmus (trans.), I. 72.

He would not tolerate a mechanical lesson, and took delight in puzzling his pupils and breaking up all routine business by startling and unexpected questions and assertions. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 425.

4. Of or pertaining to the material forces of nature acting on inanimate bodies or masses; specifically, pertaining to the principles or laws of mechanics: as, the mechanical effects of frost; the mechanical powers.

The tumult in the parts of solid bodies when they are compressed, which is the cause of all flight of bodies through the air, and of other mechanical motions, . . . is not seen at all. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 98.

5. Effected by material force or forces; consisting in the play of material forces: as, mechanical pressure.

I doubt, however, if a view which recognizes only a mechanical course of Nature can logically do anything with such ideas as those of reverence, and so forth, but reckon them among the morbid productions of imagination to which nothing real corresponds, and of which it has already learnt to reject so many. Lotze, Microcosmus (trans.), II. 109.

6. Exalting the material forces of the universe above the spiritual; subordinating the spiritual to the material; materialistic: as, the mechanical philosophy (specifically, atomism); a mechanical view of life.—7. Belonging to or characteristic of mechanics or artisans, or their class; mechanic-like; having the character or status of an artisan; hence (chiefly in old writings), mean, low, or vulgar.

Hang him, mechanical salt-butter rogue.
Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 2. 290.

The lower part [containeth] the houses of artificers and mechanical men that keepe their shops there.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 217.

8. Engaged in operating machines or machinery, or in superintending their operation: as, a mechanical engineer.—9. Exhibiting or indicating skill in contrivance, invention, or the use of tools and machines: as, a mechanical genius; a mechanical turn of mind.—10. Effected or controlled by physical forces that are not chemical: as, a mechanical mixture (that is, one in which the several ingredients still retain their identity, and are held together by no special force whether of cohesion or chemical attraction); mechanical decomposition.—Mechanical construction of a curve, a construction performed by means of a mechanical contrivance.—Mechanical curve. See curve.—Mechanical drawing. Same as geometrical drawing (which see, under drawing).—Mechanical engineering, finger, firing. See the nouns.—Mechanical equivalent of heat. See equivalent.—Mechanical impermeator, involution, leech. See the nouns.—Mechanical lamp. Same as carcel-lamp.—Mechanical line†. See line[2].—Mechanical manœuvers (milit.), the mounting, dismounting, and transportation of cannon and gun-carriages.—Mechanical mixture. See chemical combination, under chemical.—Mechanical philosophy, physics considered as affording a basis for philosophy or the explanation of the universe.—Mechanical pigeon. See pigeon.—Mechanical powers, the simple machines. See machine, 2.—Mechanical solution of a problem, a solution by any art or contrivance not strictly geometrical, as by means of the ruler and compasses or other instruments.—Mechanical stage, in micros. See microscope.—Mechanical telegraph, an automatic telegraph in which a message represented by a series or succession of dots on a paper ribbon is passed under a key or stylus, the circuit being made or broken by the simple mechanical passing through of the ribbon.—Mechanical theory in med., an ancient theory that all diseases were principally caused by lentor, or morbid viscidity of the blood.—Mechanical work, work consisting in the moving of a body through space, generally in opposition to gravity.—Rocks of mechanical origin in geol., rocks composed of sand, pebbles, fragments, and the like: a term used by some (not aptly) as the equivalent of clastic or fragmental.—Syn. Mechanical, Physical, Chemical. These epithets are thus distinguished: Those changes endured by bodies which concern their masses without altering their constitution—i. e. losing their identity—such as changes of place, of figure, etc., are mechanical; those which concern the position of the molecules—i. e. which change the molecular state of bodies, as when iron is melted—are physical; those which concern the number or arrangement of atoms within the molecule and cause a change of constitution are chemical, as when iron rusts—i. e. oxidizes—or gunpowder explodes.

II.† n. A mechanic.

A crew of patches, rude mechanicals,
That work for bread upon Athenian stalls.
Shak., M. N. D., III. ii. 9.

mechanicalize (mē-kan'i-kal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mechanicalized, ppr. mechanicalizing. [Formerly mechanicallize; < mechanical + -ize.] To render mechanical; reduce to a mechanical level or status. Cotgrave. [Rare.]

mechanically (mē-kan'i-kal-i), adv. 1. In agreement with mechanical principles; according to the laws of mechanism or good workmanship: as, the machine is mechanically perfect.

The chick with all its parts is not a mechanically contrived engine. Boyle, Works, III. 68.

2. By mechanical force or means; by physical power: as, water mechanically raised.—3. In a manner resembling a machine; without care or reflection; by the mere force of habit; automatically; not spontaneously: as, to play on an instrument mechanically.

Guards, mechanically formed in ranks.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 136.

4. Without loss of the constitution or identity of elements; in a manner involving change of place or figure without change of structure or constitution; without the aid of chemical attraction: as, elements mechanically united in air; a body mechanically decomposed.

mechanicalness (mē-kan'i-kal-nes), n. The state of being mechanical, or governed by or as if by mechanism.

mechanician (mek-a-nish'an), n. [= F. mécanicien; as mechanic + -ian.] 1. One who is skilled in mechanics or in machinery; one who is versed in the principles of machines or of mechanical construction.

Even a mechanician, if he has never looked into a piano, will, if shown a damper, be unable to conceive its function or relative value. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 1.

2. A mechanic; an artisan.

A mechanician or mechanicall workman is he whose skil is without knowledge of mathematicall demonstration. Dee, Preface to Euclid (1570).

The engraver was considered in the light of a mechanician, and, except in a very few instances, his name was not displayed. Ure, Dict., II. 293.

mechanicize (mē-kan'i-sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mechanicized, ppr. mechanicizing. [< mechanic + -ize.] To render mechanical. [Rare.]

Because no branch of the race was more mechanicized by Lockianism than the American. The American, X. 39.

mechanicochemical (mē-kan"i-kō-kem'i-kal), a. [< mechanic + chemical.] Pertaining to or dependent on both mechanics and chemistry; involving phenomena that require for their explanation an application of the laws of mechanics and chemistry, as, for example, explosions produced by chemical decompositions.

mechanics (mē-kan'iks), n. [Pl. of mechanic: see -ics.] 1. The theory of machines. This is the old meaning of the word, especially before the development of the modern doctrine of force.

I do not here take the term Mechanicks in that stricter and more proper sense wherein it is wont to be taken when it is used only to signify the doctrine about the moving powers (as the beam, the lever, the screws, and the wedge), and of framing engines to multiply force; but I here understand the word Mechanicks in a larger sense, for those disciplines that consist of the applications of the pure mathematicks to produce or modify motion in inferior bodies. Boyle, Works, III. 435.

2. The mathematical doctrine of the motions and tendencies to motion of particles and systems under the influence of forces and constraints; in a narrower sense, this doctrine as applied to systems of rigid bodies. Mechanics is now commonly divided into kinematics and dynamics, and the latter into statics and kinetics. Mechanics treated by means of the infinitesimal calculus is called analytical mechanics. The fundamental principles of mechanics are stated under energy and force; but the science is characterized by the great number of derived principles made use of. See principle.

Newton defined the laws, rules, or observed order of the phenomena of motion which come under our daily observation with greater precision than had been before attained; and, by following out with marvellous power and subtlety the mathematical consequences of these rules, he almost created the modern science of pure mechanics.
Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XXI. 489.

mechanism (mek'a-nizm), n. [=F. mécanisme = Sp. mecanismo = Pg. mechanismo = It. mecanismo, < ML. mechanismus*, LL. mechanisma, < Gr. μηχάνισμα*, contrivance, < μηχανίζειν*, contrive, < μηχανή, contrivance: see machine, mechanic.] 1. The structure of a machine, engine, or other contrivance for controlling, transforming, or utilizing natural forces or motions; the arrangement and relation of parts, or the parts collectively, in any machine, tool, or other contrivance; means of mechanical action; machinery; hence, the structure of anything that is conceived to resemble a machine.

The mechanism—that is, the bulk and figure of the bone and muscles, and the insertion of the muscle into the bone.
N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, ii. 6.

Although many authors have spoken of the wonderful mechanism of speech, none has hitherto attended to the far more wonderful mechanism which it puts into action behind the scene. D. Stewart, Human Mind, II. ii. 2.

It will not do therefore to say that light is propagated through air in one way, by one sort of mechanism, when the air is very rare, and by another when the air is very dense. Stokes, Light, p. 79.

The mind is not content to have connections of ideas imposed on it by the mechanism of perception and memory.
Lotze, Microcosmus (trans.), I. 232.

2. A mechanical contrivance or agency of any kind; in general, the apparatus, means, or mode by which particular effects are produced or purposes accomplished: as, the mechanism of a musical instrument (the apparatus by means of which the performer acts upon it); the mechanism of a play or of a poem; the mechanism of government.—3†. Action according to the laws of mechanics; mechanical action.

After the chyle has passed through the lungs, nature continues her usual mechanism to convert it into animal substances. Arbuthnot, Aliments.

mechanist (mek'ạ-nist), n. [< mechan(ic) + -ist.] 1. A maker of machines, or one skilled in machinery or in mechanical work; a mechanician.

The mechanist will be afraid to assert before hardy contradiction the possibility of tearing down bulwarks with a silk-worm's thread. Johnson, Rambler, No. 117.

What titles will he keep? will he remain
Musician, gardener, builder, mechanist,
A planter, and a rearer from the seed?
Wordsworth, Excursion, vii.

2. One of a school of philosophers who refer all the changes in the universe to the effect of merely mechanical forces.

mechanistic (mek-ạ-nis'tik), a. [< mechanist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mechanism or to mechanists: as, "mechanistic combination," Nature, XXX. 383.

mechanize (mek'ạ-nīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mechanized, ppr. mechanizing. [= OF. mechaniser, mechanizer; < Gr. μηχανίζειν*, contrive, < μηχανή, a contrivance: see machine, mechanic.] To render mechanical; bring into the form of mechanism; form mechanically; bring into a mechanical state or condition.

The human frame a mechanized automaton. Shelley.

mechanizer (mek'ạ-nī-zėr), n. One who mechanizes; a believer in mechanical order or system; a utilitarian or formalist.

Our European Mechanizers are a sect of boundless diffusion, activity, and coöperative spirit: has not Utilitarianism flourished . . . within the last fifty years? Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, iii. 5.

mechanograph (mē-kan'ō-gràf), n. [< Gr. μηχανή, a machine, + γράφειν, write.] A machine-made copy, as of a writing, a work of art, etc.

mechanographic (mek‴ạ-nō-graf'ik), a. [< mechanograph-y + -ic.] 1. Treating of mechanics. [Rare.]—2. Pertaining to mechanography.

mechanographist (mek-ạ-nog'rạ-fist), n. [< mechanograph-y + -ist.] One who by mechanical means multiplies copies of any work of art, writing, or the like.

mechanography (mek-ạ-nog'rạ-fi), n. [< Gr. μηχανή, a machine, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] The art of multiplying copies of a writing or a work of art by the use of a machine.

mechanology (mek-ạ-nol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μηχανή, a machine, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The knowledge of, or a treatise on, mechanics or mechanism. [Rare.]

The science of style, considered as a machine, in which words act upon words, and through a particular grammar, might be called the mechanology of style. De Quincey, Style, i.

mechanurgy (mek'ạ-nėr-ji), n. [< Gr. μηχανουργία, < μηχανουργός, an engineer, < μηχανή, a machine, + ἔργειν*, work.] That branch of mechanics which treats of moving machines. [Rare.]

meche[1]†, mechel†, a. Middle English variants of much.

meche[2]†, n. An obsolete form of match[2].

Mechitarist, n. See Mekhitarist.

Mechlin (mek'lin), a. and n. I, a. Pertaining to or produced at Mechlin or Malines in Belgium.—Mechlin embroidery†, an old name for Mechlin lace, because its peculiar manufacture gives it somewhat the look of embroidery. Dict. Needlework.—Mechlin lace. See lace.

II, n. Same as Mechlin lace.

Mechoacan root. See root.

Mecistops (mē-sis'tops), n. [NL., < Gr. μήκιστος, μάκιστος, superl. of μακρός, long, + ὤψ, face.] A genus of African crocodiles of the family Crocodilidæ, founded by J. E. Gray in 1862. They have the hind feet webbed, the plates of the back and neck connected, and the jaws slender, not enlarged at the end. ★M. bennetti or cataphractus is an example.

Meckelian (me-kē'liạn), a. [< Meckel (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to J. F. Meckel (1781–1833), a German anatomist.—Meckelian ganglion, rod, etc. See the nouns.

Mecoceras (mē-kos'e-ras), n. [NL. (Guenée, 1857), < μῆκος, length, + κέρας, horn.] A genus of geometrid moths, typical of the subfamily Mecocerinæ, comprising a single beautiful species from South America.

Mecocerinæ (mē-kos-e-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mecoceras + -inæ.] A subfamily of geometrid moths, typified by the genus Mecoceras. Also raised to family rank as Mecoceridæ.

mecock†, n. See meacock.

mecometer (mē-kom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. μῆκος, length (cf. μακρός, long: see macron), + μέτρον, a measure.] A kind of graduated compass used at the Maternity Hospital in Paris for measuring new-born infants.

meconarceine (mek-ō-när'sē-in), n. [< meco(nic) + narc(otic) + -ine[2].] An alkaloid obtained from opium: said to be a useful hypnotic.

meconate (mek'ō-nāt), n. [< mecon(ic) + -ate[1].] A salt of meconic acid.

meconic (mē-kon'ik), a. [< Gr. μηκωνικός, pertaining to a poppy, < μήκων (> L. mecon), a poppy, poppy-seed, poppy-juice, opium, = OBulg. maků = OHG. māhan*, MHG. māhen, mān*, G. mohn, also OHG. māgo, MHG. māge = OSw. (val)mughi, Sw. (vall)mo = Dan. (val)mue, poppy; the Teut. forms prob. not of native origin.] Pertaining to or derived from the poppy.—Meconic acid, $C_7H_4O_7$, the peculiar acid with which morphine is combined in opium. When pure, it forms small white crystals. Its aqueous solution shows a deep-red color with the persalts of iron, which therefore are good tests for it. It is a triatomic dibasic acid, most of its salts containing but two equivalents of the base.

meconidine (mē-kon'i-din), n. [< mecon(ic) + -id- + -ine[2].] One of the alkaloids contained in opium.

meconidium (mek-ō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. meconidia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. μήκων, part of the intestines of testaceous animals, also the ink-bag of a cuttlefish, lit. poppy, poppy-seed (see meconic), + dim. -ιδιον.] The fixed generative medusoid of some calyptoblastic hydroids, as of the genus Gonothyrea, in which the sexual elements are matured and from which the embryos are discharged in the form of ciliated planulas. These generative buds or zoöids develop upon the gonotheca, several in succession from above downward, retaining their direct communication with the blastostyle; when fully matured they are sacs hanging to the gonotheca by a narrow stalk or peduncle, having an opening or mouth at the far end surrounded by a circlet of tentacles, through which mouth the ova escape; the cavity of the hollow meconidium communicates with that of the blastostyle, and the medusoid, after performing its function, decays upon its stem, never becoming detached as a free zoöid.

meconin (mek'ō-nin), n. [< mecon(ic) + -in[2].] A neutral substance ($C_{10}H_{10}O_4$) existing in opium. It is white, fusible, and crystalline.

meconioid (mē-kō'ni-oid), a. [< meconium + -oid.] Resembling meconium.

meconiorrhœa (mē-kō‴ni-ō-rē'ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μηκώνιον, poppy-juice, the first feces of infants, + ῥοία, a flow, < ῥεῖν, flow.] A morbidly increased discharge of meconium.

meconium (mē-kō'ni-um), n. [< L. meconium, < Gr. μηκώνιον, poppy-juice, the first feces of infants, < μήκων, the poppy: see meconic.] 1†. Poppy-juice.—2. The feces of a new-born infant.—3. In entom., the feces of an adult insect just transformed from the pupa.

meconology (mek-ō-nol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μήκων, the poppy, opium, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on the poppy, or on opium.

meconophagism (mek-ō-nof'ạ-jizm), n. [As meconophag-ist + -ism.] Opium-eating; the opium habit.

The death of the patient being attributed to causes which are supposed to be disconnected from the meconophagism. Alien. and Neurol., VII. 463.

meconophagist (mek-ō-nof'ạ-jist), n. [< Gr. μήκων, the poppy, opium, + φαγεῖν, eat, + -ist.] An opium-eater; one who has contracted the opium or morphine habit.

If they happen to find solace in opium readily, they become meconophagists. Alien. and Neurol., VII. 471.

Meconopsis (mek-ō-nop'sis), n. [NL. (Vigier, 1821), < Gr. μήκων, the poppy, + ὄψις, appearance.] A genus of plants of the family Papaveraceæ, the poppy family, characterized by a capsule which splits open for a short distance, and by a club-shaped style bearing from four to six radiate-deflexed stigma-lobes. They are herbs, having a yellow juice, entire or lobed leaves, and showy yellow, purple, or blue flowers, which droop in the bud, and are borne on long peduncles. About 25 species have been described, natives of western Europe, central and eastern Asia, and western North America. M. cambrica, the Welsh poppy, a plant of rocky and woody places in parts of western Europe, has bright-green hairy pinnate leaves, slender stems, and large terminal sulphur-yellow flowers. This and several other species are cultivated for ornament.

Mecoptera (mē-kop'te-rạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μῆκος, length, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] In some systems, an order of neuropteroid insects corresponding to the Panorpidæ or scorpion-flies, proposed for uniformity of nomenclature instead of Brauer's term Panorpatæ. ★Also, incorrectly, Mecaptera. Packard, 1888.

med. An abbreviation of medicine, medical.

Meda (mē'dạ), n. [NL. (Girard, 1856); a made word.] A genus of cyprinoid fishes, typical of the subfamily Medinæ, containing such as M. fulgida of the Gila river in Arizona.

★medal (med'al), n. [< OF. medaille, F. médaille (> D. G. medaille = Dan. medalje = Sw. medalj) = Sp. medalla = Pg. medalha = It. medaglia, ML. reflex medallia, medalia, medalea, medalla, medale (> OHG. medilla, medila, MHG. medele), a medal, < LL. as if metallea*, < L. metallum, metal: see metal.] A piece of metal, usually circular in form, bearing devices (types) and inscriptions, struck or cast to commemorate a person, an institution, or an event, and distinguished from a coin by not being intended to serve as a medium of exchange. The word is also sometimes used to designate coins, particularly ancient coins in the precious metals, or fine medieval or Renaissance coins, in collections. Some of the Greek and Roman coin-types are commemorative, and the Roman medallions were of a quasi-medallic character. Strictly speaking, however, the medal is a creation of modern times. The earliest, and in point of portraiture the finest, medals were produced in Italy about the middle of the fifteenth century by Vittore Pisano of Verona. Fine medals were also executed in Italy, Germany, and France during the sixteenth century. English medals begin practically with the reign of Henry VIII. The earliest specimens are cast, but in the reign of James I. the process of striking began to be employed. Thomas Rawlins, Thomas Simon, and Abraham Simon (seventeenth century) are the principal medalists who were natives of England; but some of the best English medals were the productions of foreign artists, as Trezzo (time of Philip and Mary), Simon Passe (James I.), N. Briot (Charles I.), the Roettier family (Charles II.), and J. Croker (Anne).

An antique medal, half consumed with rust. Boyle, Works, V. 545.

Italian and French writers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries use medaglie and médailles to signify coins which, being no longer in circulation, were preserved in the cabinets of collectors as curiosities. Even in the last century our own word medal was so employed. The medals of the Roman Emperors to which Gibbon often alludes in his notes to the "Decline and Fall" are, of course, what are now known as coins; and Addison's "Dialogue upon the Usefulness of Medals" is, for the most part, a treatise on Roman imperial coins. W. Wroth, in Coins and Medals (1885), p. 236.

Counterfeit Medals Act. See counterfeit.—Madonna medal. See madonna.

medal (med'al), v. t.; pret. and pp. medaled or medalled, ppr. medaling or medalling. [< medal, n.] To decorate with a medal; confer a medal upon; present with a medal as a mark of honor. [Rare.]

Irving went home, medalled by the king, diplomatized by the university, crowned, and honoured, and admired. Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, Nil nisi Bonum.

medal-cup (med'al-kup), n. A drinking-vessel of metal, usually silver, in which coins or medallions are incrusted and form a part of the decoration. Usually these coins are so inset that both sides can be seen, the interior of the cup as well as the exterior being in this way made ornamental. In some cases a series of coins of a single sovereign or of a succession of sovereigns is used.

Silver Medal-cup. (The medals are all of the Dukes of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel.)

medalet (med'al-et), n. [< medal + -et.] Any medal of small size. When not larger than, for example, the English florin or half-crown, or United States half-dollar, medals are generally called by this name; but numismatists do not make any rigid distinction between medals and medalets.

I shall beg leave to give this class the appellation of medalets, as the genius of our language admits of this diminutive in ringlet, bracelet, and the like. Pinkerton, Essay on Medals, I. § 13.

medalist, medallist (med'al-ist), n. [< F. médailliste = Sp. medallista; as medal + -ist.] 1. An engraver, stamper, or molder of medals.

Sculptors, painters, and medallists exerted their utmost skill in the work of transmitting his features to posterity. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., viii.

2. One who is skilled in medals.

Nothing could be more Civil and Franc than this Gentleman, whom I believe to be the best Medalist in Europe. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 98.

As a medallist, you are not to look upon a cabinet of medals as a treasure of money, but of knowledge. Addison, Ancient Medals, i.

3. One who has gained a medal as a reward of merit.

I backed my man to be not only Senior Classic, but First Chancellor's Medalist, and to be a Medalist at all he must be a Senior Optime in Mathematics. C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 215.

medallic (mē-dal'ik), a. [< medal + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the character of, or represented on a medal or medals: as, the medallic art; a medallic coin or portrait.

I have lately seen, says Eugenius, a medallic history of the present King of France. Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

If it is possible to conceive literature destroyed, and modern cities and their monuments in ruin and decay, medallic coins would become the most durable memorials. Jevons, Money and Mech. of Exchange, p. 63.

medallion (mē-dal′yon), n. [< F. médaillon (= Sp. medallón), a large medal, a medallion, locket, etc., < médaille, a medal: see medal.] 1. A medal of large size. Some Greek coins of unusually large module are popularly, though incorrectly, so called: as, the Syracusan medallions. The pieces called by numismatists the Roman medallions are generally struck in copper, though sometimes in the precious metals, and bear a general resemblance to the sestertii or large bronze coins of the earlier Roman emperors; but they are often of finer workmanship than the coins, and are not inscribed with the letters S. C. (for senatus consulto). These medallions (the ancient name of which is not known) did not circulate as money, but were given by the emperors as presents to state officials and others. Their types are of a more or less commemorative character.

Obverse. Reverse.
Medallion of Maximus I. (Size of the original.)

Medallions [were], . . . in respect of the other coins, . . . the same as modern medals in respect of modern money. They were exempted from all commerce, and had no other value but what was set upon them by the fancy of the owner. They are supposed to have been struck by emperors for presents to their friends, foreign princes, or ambassadors. Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

2. Anything resembling the classical medallion. (a) A circular or oval disk decorated with figures, as a portrait with legends, and cast in metal. Medallions of this sort were common at the epoch of the Renaissance, and are among the most interesting specimens of the sculptures of that time. (b) In arch., a tablet, circular, oval, square, or of any other form, bearing on it objects represented in relief, as figures, heads, animals, flowers, etc., and applied to an exterior or interior wall, a frieze, or other architectural member; a cartouche. (c) A member in a decorative design resembling a panel; a space reserved for some special work of art, as a landscape, a portrait, etc., or merely filled with ornamentation different from the surface around it: as, a medallion in a carpet, on a painted vase, etc.

medallion-carpet (mē-dal′yon-kär″pet), n. A carpet woven in one piece, with a large central figure, surrounded by a plainer surface, and usually a border.

medallioned (mē-dal′yond), a. [< medallion + *-ed*².] Ornamented with a medallion or medallions.

medallion-pattern (mē-dal′yon-pat″ėrn), n. In decorative art, a design for the ornamentation of a surface of which a medallion or medallions form an important part.

medallist, n. See medalist.

medallurgy (med′al-ėr-ji), n. [< medal + Gr. ἔργειν, work. Cf. metallurgy.] The art of designing and striking medals. [Obsolescent.]

medal-machine (med′al-ma-shēn″), n. A machine for copying medals and similar works in relief or in intaglio, on a scale larger or smaller than the originals. It is an adaptation of the carving-machine.

medal-play (med′al-plā), n. In golf, play in which the score is reckoned by counting the total number of strokes taken to complete the round.

medal-tankard (med′al-tang″kärd), n. Same as medal-cup.

meddle (med′l), v.; pret. and pp. meddled, ppr. meddling. [Early mod. E. also medle; < ME. medlen, medelen, < OF. medler, mesler, assimilated meiler, meller, F. mêler = Pr. messlar = Sp. mezclar = Pg. mesclar = It. mischiare, mescolare, mix, < ML. as if misculare*, < L. miscere, mix: see *mix*¹. Cf. *mell*¹, medley, intermeddle, etc.]

I.† trans. To mix; mingle.

Wordly [worldly] selynesse,
Which clerkes callen fals felicitee,
Ymedled is with many a bitternesse.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 815.

Six sexter with a pounde
Of hoñey meddel thai, and save it sounde.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 118.

A medled estate of the orders of the Gospel and the ceremonies of popery is not the best way to banish popery. Quoted in Hooker's Eccles. Polity, iv. 8.

He tok his seurd in hand, the croyce let he falle,
And medeled him in the pres, among the barons alle.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 18.

II. intrans. 1†. To be mixed or mingled; mix.

More to know
Did never meddle with my thoughts.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 23.

2†. To mingle in association or interest; concern one's self; take part; deal: generally requiring with in construction.

Whan these iiij kynges saugh that these were a-monge hem medelinge, thei departed her peple in tweyne, and lefte viij[m] fighting stille. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 207.

Study to be quiet, and to meddle with your own business. Tyndale, 1 Thes. iv. 11.

Meddle not with them that are given to change. Prov. xxiv. 21.

The shoemaker should meddle with his yard, and the tailor with his last. Shak., R. and J., i. 2. 40.

3. To interfere or take part inappropriately, improperly, or impertinently; concern or busy one's self with or about something without necessity or warrant; act in a matter with which one has no business: used absolutely, or followed by in or with.

Why shouldest thou meddle to thy hurt? 2 Ki. xiv. 10.

In those days nobody meddled with concerns above his comprehension. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 163.

Miss Alethen was a lady of excellent sense, and did not meddle with him any more. J. E. Cooke, Virginia Comedians, I. xxx.

To meddle or make, to have to do; take part; interfere. [Colloq.]

For such kind of men, the less you meddle or make with them, why, the more is for your honesty. Shak., Much Ado, iii. 3. 55.

meddler (med′lėr), n. One who meddles; one who interferes or busies himself with things in which he has no personal or proper concern; an officious person; a busybody.

Do not drive away such as bring thee information as meddlers, but accept of them in good part. Bacon, Of Great Place.

Layer-overs for meddlers. See layer-over.

meddlesome (med′l-sum), a. [< meddle + -some.] Given to meddling; apt to interpose in the affairs of others; inclined to be officiously intrusive.

Honour, that meddlesome, officious ill, Pursues thee e'en to death. Blair, The Grave.

meddlesomeness (med′l-sum-nes), n. Officious interference in or with the affairs of others.

I shall propound some general rules according to which such meddlesomeness is commonly blameable. Barrow, Sermons, I. xxi.

meddling¹ (med′ling), n. [< ME. medlyng, meddelynge; verbal n. of meddle, v.] 1. The act or habit of interfering in matters not of one's proper concern.

Most of the vices of Frederic's administration resolve themselves into one vice, the spirit of meddling. Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

2†. Contention in battle; fighting.

Whan Agravayn hadde the horse, he lepte vp as soone as he myght, and than be-gan the meddelynge amonge hem full crewell and fell. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 199.

meddling² (med′ling), p. a. Officious; unwarrantably busy or officiously interposing in other men's affairs: as, a meddling neighbor.

A medling man is one that has nothing to do with his businesse, and yet no man busier than hee, and his businesse is most in his face. Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Medling Man.

meddlingly (med′ling-li), adv. In a meddling manner; officiously.

mede¹†, mede²†, n. Middle English forms of *mead*¹ and meed.

Mede³ (mēd), n. [= F. Mède, < L. Medus, pl. Medi, < Gr. Μῆδος, usually in pl. Μῆδοι, the Medes, = Heb. Mādhai, the Medes, Media, Mādhī, a Mede, < OPers. and Zend Māda, a Mede.] A native or an inhabitant of Media, an ancient kingdom of Asia, south of the Caspian Sea, and later a part of the Persian empire.

The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. Dan. vi. 12.

medeful†, a. A Middle English form of meedful.

Medeola (mē-dē′ō-lä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. Medēa, Media, < Gr. Μήδεια, Medea, famed as a sorceress.] A genus of liliaceous plants of the tribe Parideæ. It is characterized by a whorl of leaves at the middle of the stem, and by the flowers being in a terminal umbel, surrounded by three involucrate leaves. There is but a single species, M. Virginica, the Indian cucumber-root, which is common in damp, rich woods in North America. See cucumber-root.

Flowering Plant of Indian Cucumber-root (Medeola Virginica). a, flower; b, fruit.

Medeoleæ (mē-dē-ō′lē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Medeola + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Liliaceæ. It is characterized by a bulbless stem (the few leaves radical, or whorled on the stem), terminal solitary or umbelled flowers, extrorse anthers, and an indehiscent fleshy fruit. It contains 5 genera and about 32 species, natives of North America and the northern and temperate parts of Europe and Asia. Nearly the same as Link's Parideæ.

media¹ (mē′di-ä), n. [L., fem. of medius, middle: see medium.] In anat., the middle tunic of an artery or a lymphatic vessel. Leidy, Anat. (1889).

media², n. Plural of medium.

mediacy (mē′di-ā-si), n. [< media(te) + -cy.] 1. The state of being mediate; the state or fact of being a medium or mean cause.—2. Mediation.

Were there in these syllogisms no occult conversion of an undeclared consequent, no mediacy from the antecedent, they could not in their ostensible conclusion reverse the quantities of Breadth and Depth. Sir W. Hamilton.

mediad (mē′di-ad), adv. [< *media*¹ + *-ad*³.] In anat. and zoöl., to or toward the meson or middle line or plane in situation or direction; mesiad.

Almost all the Lamellibranchiata have two pairs of these gills on either side: an inner pair, which are placed mediad, and an outer pair at the sides of these. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 336.

mediæval, mediævalism, etc. See medieval, etc.

medial (mē′di-al), a. and n. [< LL. medialis, ★of the middle, < L. medius, middle: see medium.]

I. a. 1. Pertaining to the middle; situated or existing between two extremities or extremes; intermediate in situation, rank, or degree: as, the medial letters of a word; a medial mark on an insect's wing.

The inherent use of all medial knowledges, all truths, cognitions, books, appearings, and teachings, is that they bring us in to know God by an immediate knowledge. Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, p. 123.

Among the Dipnoi, Protopterus retains the medial row of rays only, which have the form of fine rods of cartilage. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 477.

2. Mean; pertaining to a mean or average.—3. In modern spiritualism, pertaining to a medium or to mediumship; mediumistic: as, medial faculties; medial phenomena.—4. In zoöl. and anat., same as *median*¹ and mesal.—5. In bot., same as *median*¹.—Alligation medial. See alligation.—Medial cadence. (a) In Gregorian music, a cadence closing with the chord of the mediant of any mode. (b) In modern music, a cadence, final or not, in which the next to the last chord is inverted; an inverted cadence.—Medial cells, basal cells of an insect's wing, between the subcostal, median, and submedian veins, distinguished in the Hymenoptera. Also called median and brachial cells.—Medial consonances, in music, a term used by Helmholtz for the major third and major sixth, as distinguished from the minor third and minor sixth.—Medial eyes, eyes equally distant from the base of the head and the apex or end of the labrum.—Medial line, a line whose length is a mean proportional between those of two other lines.—Medial moraine, stress, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. In Gr. gram., one of the mutes β, γ, δ, as if intermediate in sound between the surd mutes π, κ, τ and the aspirates φ, χ, θ. The term medial (Latin media) translates the technical Greek μέσον, sc. ἄφωνον, middle mute.

medially (mē′di-al-i), adv. In or along the middle; as regards the middle; midway: as, medially situated.

medialuna (mē″di-a-lū′nä), n. A pimelepteroid fish of the Pacific coast, Medialuna californica. It has an ovate form, vertical fins not falcate, color blackish above with bluish and lighter tints below, the fins blackish. It is about one foot long, is common along the coast from Point Conception in California southward, ★and is an esteemed food-fish.

median¹ (mē′di-an), a. [= F. médian = Sp. Pg. It. mediano, < L. medianus, that is in the middle, < medius, middle: see medium. Cf. *mean*³ and mizzen, ult. doublets of *median*¹.] Pertaining to or situated in the middle; specifically, in anat. and zoöl., intermediate as dividing the body by a longitudinal and vertical plane; medial; mesal: as, the linea alba is the median line of the abdomen; in bot., situated in or along, or belonging to, the middle of a structure having a right side and a left. See below.—Median area, in entom., a large space occupying the center of the wing, from base to end, lying between the median and submedian or internal veins. In Orthoptera it is often marked by a different structure from the rest of the wing.—Median artery, a branch, usually of the anterior interosseous, accompanying the median nerve. It is sometimes of large size, and may arise from the ulnar or the brachial.—Median basilic vein. See basilic.—Median cells. Same as medial cells. See medial.—Median cephalic vein, the vein of the arm which connects the median and the cephalic vein. Also called medicephalic vein. It is one of the veins commonly selected for venesection.—Median coverts, in ornith., those coverts of the secondaries which intervene between the greater and lesser coverts. See cut under covert.—Median foveola. See foveola.—Median line, a line passing or supposed to pass exactly through the middle of something specified. Specifically—(a) In anat., the periphery of the median plane; the dorsimeson or ventrimeson, or both of these, dividing the surface of the body into equal right and left halves; also, any line which lies in the meson or median plane. (b) In crystal., same as mean line and bisectrix. See bisectrix, 1. (c) In climatology, the average central course of a trade-wind.

The mean position of the median line lies at least six or seven degrees north of the equator.
Croll, Climate and Time, p. 231.

Median nerve. (a) The principal nerve of the front of the arm, situated between the musculocutaneous and the ulnar, arising from the upper and lower cords of the brachial plexus by two heads which embrace the axillary artery, and prolonged to the hand. (b) In bot., a nerve traversing the middle of a leaf or leaf-like expansion.—Median plane. (a) In anat. and zoöl., an imaginary vertical plane supposed to divide the body longitudinally into two equal parts, right and left; the meson. (b) In bot., of a flower or other lateral structure of a plant, a vertical plane which bisects the anterior and posterior sides, and which, if prolonged, would pass through the center of the parent axis. Goebel. Also called anteroposterior plane.—Median shade, in entom., a more or less distinct shaded band or mark running transversely across the middle of the anterior wing, found in most noctuid moths.—Median stress. See stress.—Median vein. (a) In anat., the middle superficial vein of the front of the forearm, dividing at or near the bend of the elbow into the median basilic and median cephalic. The former of these soon joins one of the brachial veins which accompany the brachial artery; the latter soon unites with the radial to form the cephalic, which continues superficial up the arm to join the axillary or subclavian. (b) In entom., the third main longitudinal vein or rib of an insect's wing, counting from the anterior border.—Median wall, in archegoniate plants, a wall in a plane at right angles to the basal wall, dividing the pro-embryo into lateral halves. Goebel.—Median zone. See zone.

Median and other Veins of Arm.

1, tendon of biceps; 2, brachial artery; 3, bicipital fascia; 4, internal cutaneous nerves; 5, external cutaneous nerves; m, median vein; mb, median basilic; mc, median cephalic; b, basilic; c, cephalic; r, radial; au, pu, anterior and posterior ulnar veins. Several unnamed veins are also shown. All these veins are superficial to df, df, the general deep fascia of the parts; mb or mc is usually selected for venesection.

Median[2] (mē′di-an), a. and n. [< L. Media, < Gr. Μηδία, Media, < Μῆδοι, the Medes: see Mede[3].] I. a. Of or pertaining to Media, an ancient kingdom of Asia. Also Medic.

Ev'ry day did change attire,

Shelley, Queen Mab, v.

mediatization (mē″di-ā-ti-zā′shọn), n. [< mediatize + -ation.] The act of mediatizing, or the state of being mediatized. See mediatize.

mediatize (mē′di-ā-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mediatized, ppr. mediatizing. [< mediate + -ize.] 1. To make mediate; reduce from an immediate or direct to a mediate or indirect relation through the interposition of a secondary superior or controlling agency. Applied specifically to the process of converting one of the minor German states or princely families of the old empire from the semi-independent condition of having a direct share in the imperial government, and responsibility to it, to that of subordination to an intervening power, by being annexed to it while retaining all local possessory and governmental rights. By this process, especially under the Westphalian treaties of 1648, and the changes leading to the dissolution of the old empire and the formation of the Confederation of the Rhine in 1806, the number of mediatized states and princely families became very large.

The same peace [that of Lunéville] declared that all the secular princes who had lost territory by this cession were to be indemnified by the Empire. This was done at Regensburg in 1803. The indemnifying material was obtained by mediatizing all the free cities but six, and all the spiritual estates but two. Lowe, Bismarck, Int., p. vi.

'Your Highness," I said (it is a title appertaining to him as sprung from a mediatized family).
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 866.

Medicago (med-i-kā′gō), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. medica, medic, + term. -ago, as in tussilago, etc.] A genus of plants of the family Fabaceæ and the tribe Trifolieæ, the clovers. It is characterized by an obtuse keel and a scythe-shaped legume which is more or less spirally curved or twisted. There are about 40 species, natives of Europe, Asia, and Africa, but now naturalized in other parts of the world. They are herbs, or rarely shrubs, with pinnately trifoliate leaves and adnate stipules, and usually small papilionaceous flowers, which are yellow, rarely purple, and grow in axillary racemes or heads, or sometimes almost solitary. The common name of plants of the genus is medic, sometimes snail-clover. M. sativa, with purple flowers, is an important fodder-plant, cultivated under the names of alfalfa and lucerne (which see). M. lupulina, the black medic or nonesuch, closely resembles the hop-clovers, and also shares their name, but is distinguished by its black pods. It is of some agricultural value when growing with other herbage. M. Arabica, the spotted medic (heart-clover), has a peculiar, spirally coiled prickly pod. These species are all naturalized in the United States. M. arborea is a shrubby species (tree-medic, moon-trefoil) of southern Europe, said to promote the secretion of milk. M. scutellata of the Mediterranean region is also a good forage-plant, resisting drought well. M. falcata is the yellow or sickle-podded medic.

Medicean (med-i-sē′an), a. [< It. Medici (see def.), a surname (orig. pl. of medico, a physician:

see medic[1]), + -e-an.] Of or pertaining to the Medici, an illustrious family of Florence, appearing first as merchants of the medieval republic, and at the dawn of the Renaissance, in the fifteenth century, raised to supreme power through their liberality and merit. From this time on, for three centuries, amid fortunes of varying brilliancy, this family produced popes, sovereigns, and tyrants, and it occupies a large place in the history of Europe. In the fine arts and literature the epithet has particular reference to Cosimo dei Medici, known as Cosimo the Elder, and to Lorenzo the Magnificent. The former was virtual master of the Florentine republic from 1434 to 1464, and was a generous patron of the new art and letters founded on antique models; the latter was chief of the state in fact, though not in name, from 1469 to 1492, a brilliant protector of all learning, particularly of that of Greece surviving from the wreck of Constantinople, and a powerful benefactor of the arts. The Popes Leo X. (Lorenzo's son) and Clement VII. (Giulio dei Medici) carried on the traditions of the family in the fields of intellectual cultivation and achievement.—Medicean Library. Same as Laurentian Library (which see, under Laurentian).—Medicean stars, the name given by Galileo to the satellites of Jupiter.

The darkest portion of the medieval period was different in different countries. . . . In a general way, however, it may be assigned to the tenth century.
Hallam, Middle Ages.

Medieval architecture, the most important branch of medieval art, including a great number of varied styles. This architecture embodies a union of the Greek system of columnar construction with the Roman vaulting and arches, with the consequences flowing logically from the new combination. It may be considered as originating about A. D. 300, in the palace of the Emperor Diocletian at Spalato, in which arcades were introduced supported on free-standing shafts instead of the Roman piers with engaged columns, and in which the profile of the architrave was continued around the archivolt, which had usurped the architrave's function, and now sprang directly from the capital, abandoning the meaningless Roman interposition between archivolt and column of a small section of a mock entablature. Despite local differences, medieval architecture represents a continuous development from the classical Roman to the modifications wrought by the Renaissance. At its origin, copying Roman models, it was poor and rude, owing to the lack of skill and of resources in its builders. Every succeeding generation sought to perfect the system of vaulted ceilings to which the characteristic forms of this architecture are due. The application of the Roman groined vault was extended and brought into new combinations; the pointed arch and vault were evolved, as possessing more stability and elasticity than the old round-arched forms; and finally the use of ribs to strengthen and support the vault was elaborated. By about 1225 medieval architecture could solve with the utmost economy and artistic excellence any problem that could be presented to masonry construction. From about 1250 architects, embarrassed no longer by inherent difficulties, began to lose the simple beauty of their style in unnecessary elaboration of details, as in complicated window-traceries and in distorted profiles of moldings; and architecture progressively declined, so that the simplification of external forms effected by the Renaissance was a gain. But the sound and scientific medieval methods of construction remained in great part beneath the Renaissance exterior, and indeed are not yet wholly abandoned, especially in France. Many fanciful theories have been formed as to the origin of medieval architecture, especially that deriving its groined vaulting from an imitation of the lines of interlacing branches in an avenue of trees. It was, however, in fact a thoroughly logical growth from classical models, and the result of consistent efforts to adapt means to the ends sought. Thus, the problem in a great church or hall was to cover in securely a large space with as few interruptions as possible to sight and sound; hence the tendency to widen the arches and to reduce the thickness of the pillars. The great height of such buildings was not induced by a desire to "soar heavenward," but by the necessity to secure light for the nave by windows pierced above the roofs of the aisles. The typical decoration of this architecture is of the highest beauty and fitness, ornamenting but not masking the construction; and, while based chiefly on natural forms, it always, until the decline of the style, conventionalized these appropriately to their architectural function. This architecture attained its best development in France. See Byzantine, Romanesque, Pointed, etc.—Medieval art, the art of the entire middle ages in Europe, beginning in the gradual transformation of classical forms and ideals, and extending to the Renaissance, or, roughly, to the year 1500, though in Italy it actually became merged earlier in the new current of modern art, and in the north, as in England and Germany, it continued later. It embraces a countless number of regional and local styles and schools, yet all animated by a kindred spirit. It is second in importance in art-history only to the art of Greece; and, while in many ways it fell far short of Greek art, the course of its development from rude beginnings was very similar, and, like the Greek, presents a consecutive and sincere effort on the part of succeeding craftsmen and artists constantly to do better. Its ideal of beauty was less high than that of the Greeks; it was more of a didactic art, seeking, in its illuminations and painting and sculpture, to illustrate and enforce the teachings of the Bible and the inherent imperfection of man. Yet the general similarity of methods of observation and work was so close that in France especially, after the close of the archaic period in the thirteenth century, much figure-sculpture was produced, as that in the portals of the cathedral of Rheims and on the north transept of that of Rouen, which is in spirit thoroughly Greek, and is equal to all but the best Greek draped work. In decoration medieval art was preëminent. Like Greek art, it was understood and appreciated not by a small cultivated class, but by the whole people. It consistently sought to give to the commonest tools and utensils beautiful forms and characteristic ornament; while the architectural sculpture and decorative combinations of forms have never been surpassed in their variety, in their beauty of execution, and in their fitness to the ends which it was sought to attain. To the general artistic sentiment, religious fervor, and emulative spirit of the period most of the great cathedrals, embodying, like a Greek temple, the best architecture and sculpture and the best decoration of the day, owe their origin.—Medieval history, Latin, etc. See the nouns.

Medieval Architecture of the best period.—West front of Amiens Cathedral, France; 13th century.

II. n. One belonging to the middle ages.

This view of landscape differs from that of the mediævals. Ruskin.

medievalism, mediævalism (mē-di-ē′val-izm), n. [< medieval + -ism.] 1. That which is characteristic of the middle ages; the medieval spirit, practice, or methods in regard to anything; a peculiarity or characteristic of the middle ages.

Again, I say, it is a pity to have our language interlarded with Orientalisms and Mediævalisms. Nineteenth Century, XIX. 665.

2. Devotion to or adoption of the spirit or practice of the middle ages; medieval tendency in thought or action, as with respect to religion or politics.

Even Abbotsford, despite its cherished associations, jarred upon me a little, because I knew its mediævalism was all carton pierre. Miss Braddon, Hostages to Fortune, p. 12.

medievalist, mediævalist (mē-di-ē′val-ist), n. [< medieval + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in the history of the middle ages.—2. One who sympathizes with the spirit and principles of the middle ages: often with the sense of one who is antiquated or behind the times.—3. One who lived in the middle ages.

You have but to walk aside, however, into the Palazzo Pubblico, to feel yourself very much like a thrifty old mediævalist. H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 264.

medievalize, mediævalize (mē-di-ē′val-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. medievalized, mediævalized, ppr. medievalizing, mediævalizing. [< medieval + -ize.] To render medieval.

Mr. Fellows, the painter, had helped with the costumes, supplying some from his own artistic properties, and mediævalizing others. Howells, Annie Kilburn, xvi.

medievally, mediævally (mē-di-ē′val-i), adv. In a medieval manner; in accord with the spirit or method of the middle ages.

medifixed (mē′di-fikst), a. [< L. medius, middle, + fixus, fixed, + *-ed*2.] In bot., attached by the middle, as an anther upon its filament. Compare basifixed.

medifurca (mē-di-fėr′kä), n.; pl. medifurcæ (-sē). [NL., < L. medius, middle, + furca, fork.] In entom., the middle forked or double apodema which projects from the sternal wall into the cavity of a thoracic somite of an insect.

medifurcal (mē-di-fėr′kal), a. [< medifurca + -al.] Pertaining to the medifurca, or having its character: as, a medifurcal process.

medill†, a. and n. A Middle English form of middle.

Medinæ (mē-dī′nē), n. pl. [< Meda + -inæ.] A subfamily of Cyprinidæ, typified by the genus Meda. It is characterized by a short posterior dorsal fin armed with two spines, the posterior of which closes into a groove in the other, and by the adherence of the ventral fins to the abdomen by their inner margins. Few species are known, all confined to streams of the southwestern part of the United States.

Medina sandstone. See sandstone.

medine (mē′din), n. [Also medino; < F. medin (Cotgrave); appar. of Ar. origin.] A small coin and money of account in Egypt, the fortieth part of a piaster.

47 medines passe in value as the duckat of gold of Venice. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 271.

Medinilla (med-i-nil′ä), n. [NL. (Gaudichaud, 1826), named after D. J. de Medinilla y Pineda, governor of the Marianne Islands.] A genus of plants of the family Melastomaceæ, belonging to the tribe Dissochæteæ: characterized by eight, ten, or twelve nearly equal stamens, the connective of the anthers two-lobed or spurred in front and with two lobes or one spur at the back, and a calyx-tube scarcely longer than the ovary. About 100 species are known, natives of the East Indies, the Malay archipelago, Madagascar, and the islands off the west coast of Africa. They are erect or climbing shrubs, generally quite smooth, with opposite or whorled entire fleshy leaves, and clusters of white or rose-colored flowers. Several of the species are very ornamental. The most common greenhouse species is perhaps M. magnifica, a beautiful plant with pink flowers.

Medinilleæ (med-i-nil′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1867), < Medinilla + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Melastomaceæ, typified by the genus Medinilla. In Durand's compendium of the system of Bentham and Hooker the name Dissochæteæ (Naudin, 1867) is adopted for this tribe, which is also the one used by Engler and Prantl. In the latter system it embraces 19 genera and nearly 200 species, chiefly tropical plants of the old world.

medinot, n. Same as medine.

mediocral (mē′di-ō-kral), a. [< mediocre + -al.] 1†. Being of a middle quality; mediocre: as, mediocral intellect. Addison.—2. In entom., being of middle length.—Mediocral antennæ, in entom., those antennæ which have the same length as the insect's body, or which, being turned backward on the body, attain the posterior extremity. Kirby.

= Syn. To consider, reflect. See list under contemplate, v. t.

II. trans. 1. To plan; design; intend.

> Some affirmed that I meditated a war; God knows, I did not then think of war.
> Eikon Basilike.
>
> Here the grim tyrant meditates his wrath.
> Thomson, Winter, l. 898.

2. To think on; revolve in the mind; consider.

> Blessed is the man that doth meditate good things.
> Ecclus. xiv. 20.

3. To observe thoughtfully or intently; contemplate vigilantly; watch. [Rare.]

> Before his lord the ready spaniel bounds,
> Panting with hope, he tries the furrow'd grounds;
> But when the tainted gales the game betray > Crouch'd close he lies, and meditates the prey.
> Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 102.

4. In the following passage, from the Latin phrase musam meditari (Vergil, Ecl. i. 2), be occupied with song or poetry.

> Alas! what boots it with incessant care
> To tend the homely, slighted, shepherd's trade,
> And strictly meditate the thankless Muse?
> Milton, Lycidas, l. 66.

= Syn. 1. To devise, concoct.—2. To contemplate, ruminate, revolve, study.

meditatio fugæ (med-i-tā′shi-ō fū′jē). [L., contemplation of flight: see meditation and fugue.] In Scots law, a phrase noting the position of a debtor who meditates an escape to avoid the payment of his debts. When a creditor can make oath that his debtor, whether native or foreigner, is in meditatione fugæ, or when he has reasonable ground of apprehension that the debtor has such an intention, he is entitled to a warrant to apprehend the debtor. The warrant may be obtained from any judge of the Court of Session, the sheriff, a magistrate of a burgh, or a justice of the peace, and is termed a meditatio fugæ warrant. Under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1881, which abolishes imprisonment for debt except in a few special cases, warrants of this kind are practically obsolete. Imp. Dict.

meditation (med-i-tā′shọn), n. [< ME. meditacioun, < OF. meditation, F. méditation = Sp. meditación = Pg. meditação = It. meditazione, < L. meditatio(n-), < meditari, meditate: see meditate.] 1. The act of meditating; close or continued thought; the turning or revolving of a subject in the mind; sustained reflection.

> Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer.
> Ps. xix. 14.
>
> And the imperial votaress passed on
> In maiden meditation, fancy-free.
> Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 164.
>
> It should be no interruption to your pleasures to hear me often say that I love you, and that you are as much my meditations as myself.
> Donne, Letters, iv.
>
> He, then, that neglects to actuate such discourses loses the benefit of his meditation.
> Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 69.
>
> Deep and slow, exhausting thought . . .
> In meditation dwelt with learning wrought.
> Byron, Childe Harold, iii. 107.

2. Religious contemplation.

> He is within, with two right reverend fathers,
> Divinely bent to meditation.
> Shak., Rich. III., iii. 7. 62.

Meditations in order to a good life, let them be as exalted as the capacity of the person and subject will endure up to the height of contemplation; but if contemplation comes to be a distinct thing, and something besides or beyond a distinct degree of virtuous meditation, it is lost to all sense, and religion, and prudence.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 73.

3. In theol.: (a) A private devotional act, consisting in deliberate reflection upon some spiritual truth or mystery, accompanied by mental prayer and by acts of the affections and of the will, especially formation of resolutions as to future conduct. Meditation differs from study in that its principal object is not to acquire knowledge, but to advance in love of God and holiness of life. (b) A public act of devotion, in which a director leads a congregation in meditating upon some spiritual subject.—4. A short literary composition in which the subject (usually religious) is treated in a meditative manner: as, a volume of hymns and meditations.

> But natheles this meditacioun
> I putte it ay under correccioun
> Of clerkes; for I am not textuel.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Parson's Tale, l. 55.

meditationist (med-i-tā′shọn-ist), n. [< meditation + -ist.] A writer or composer of meditations. Southey, The Doctor, interchapter xxii.

meditatist (med′i-tā-tist), n. [< meditate + -ist.] One given to meditation or thoughtfulness. [Rare.]

meditative (med′i-tā-tiv), a. [= F. méditatif = Pr. meditatiu = Sp. Pg. It. meditativo, < LL. meditativus, < L. meditari, meditate: see meditate.] 1. Addicted to meditation.

> Abeillard was pious, reserved, and meditative.
> Berington, Hist. Abeillard.

2. Pertaining or inclining to or expressing meditation: as, a meditative mood.

> Inward self-disparagement affords
> To meditative spleen a grateful feast.
> Wordsworth, Excursion, iv.

meditatively (med′i-tā-tiv-li), adv. In a meditative manner; with meditation.

meditativeness (med′i-tā-tiv-nes), n. The state or character of being meditative; thoughtfulness.

medite† (med′it), v. t. [< OF. mediter, < L. meditari, meditate: see meditate.] To meditate upon; consider or study thoughtfully.

> Med'ting the sacred Temple's plot.
> Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

mediterrane† (med″i-te-rān′), a. [= F. méditerrané = Pr. mediterrane = Sp. Pg. It. mediterraneo, < L. mediterraneus, midland, inland, remote from the sea (LL. Mediterraneum mare, the Mediterranean Sea, previously called Mare magnum, nostrum, internum); as a noun, the interior; < medius, middle, + terra, land. Cf. mediterranean.] Same as mediterranean.

> They that haue seene the mediterran or inner parts of the kingdome of China, do report it to be a most amiable countrey.
> Hakluyt's Voyages, II. ii. 91.
>
> And for our own ships, they went sundry voyages, as well to your streights, which you call the Pillars of Hercules, as to other parts in the Atlantique and Mediterrane Seas.
> Bacon, New Atlantis.

★mediterranean (med″i-te-rā′nē-ạn), a. [< mediterrane + -an.] 1. In the midst of an expanse of land; away from the sea; inland.

> The mediterranean countreys have almost no stone.
> The Kyngdome of Japonia.

2. Nearly or quite surrounded by land; existing in the midst of inclosing land; confined or cut off by a bordering of land. Used specifically [cap.] as the name of the sea between Europe and Africa, the Mediterranean Sea, or (substantively) the Mediterranean, and rarely otherwise: and coming to be used generically as the name of other deep seas more or less separated from the ocean, as the 'American Mediterraneans,' meaning the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico. Mediterranean seas are peculiar in having a higher temperature in their deeper waters than prevails in the neighboring ocean at the same depth, because they have less free communication with the polar seas.

3. [cap.] Pertaining to, situated on or near, or dwelling about the Mediterranean Sea: as, the Mediterranean currents; the Mediterranean countries or races.—Mediterranean fan-palm, fever, etc. See the nouns.—Mediterranean subregion, in zoögeog., the second of four subregions into which the Palearctic region is divided. As bounded by Wallace, it includes all the countries south of the Pyrenees, Alps, Balkans, and Caucasus mountains, all the southern shores of the Mediterranean to the Atlas range and beyond to the extratropical part of the Sahara and the Nile valley to the second cataract; while eastward it includes the northern half of Arabia, all Persia and Baluchistan, and perhaps Afghanistan to the Indus.

mediterraneous† (med″i-te-rā′nē-us), a. [< L. mediterraneus, midland: see mediterrane.] Inland; remote from the ocean or sea.

> It is found in mountains and mediterraneous parts.
> Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 4.

meditullium† (mē-di-tul′i-um), n. [NL., < ML. meditullium, meditolium, etc., the middle of a thing, a yolk, hub, etc., < L. medius, middle, + -tullium, -tolium, poss. cognate with tellus, earth.] In bot., same as diploë, 2. See cut under ★diploë.

medium (mē′di-um), n. and a. [= F. médium = Sp. medio = Pg. meio = It. medio, n., a medium, middle course, < L. medium, neut. of medius, middle, = Gr. μέσος, middle: see middle.] I. n.; pl. media or mediums (-ạ, -umz). 1. That which holds a middle place or position; that which comes or stands between the extremes in a series, as of things, principles, ideas, circumstances, etc.; a mean.

> They love or hate, no medium amongst them.
> Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 167.
>
> For there is no medium between living in sin and forsaking of it; and nothing deserves the name of Repentance that is short of that.
> Stillingfleet, Sermons, iii.
>
> A gen'rous friendship no cold medium knows,
> Burns with one love, with one resentment glows.
> Pope, Iliad, ix. 725.
>
> The piece, however, has no medium; all that is not excellent is intolerably bad.
> Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xl.

Technically—(a) In math., a mean. See mean[3]. (b) In logic, the mean or middle term of a syllogism. (c) A size of paper between demy and royal. American printing-medium is 19 × 24 inches; American writing-medium, 18 × 23 inches; English printing-medium, 18 × 23 inches; English writing-medium, 17½ × 22 inches; American double medium, 24 × 38 inches, and American medium and a half, 24 × 30 inches.

2. Anything which serves or acts intermediately; something by means of which an action is performed or an effect produced; an intervening agency or instrumentality: as, the atmosphere is a medium of sound.

> Nothing comes to him not spoiled by the sophisticating medium of moral uses.
> Lamb, Old and New Schoolmaster.
>
> A negotiation was opened through the medium of the ambassador.
> Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xviii.
>
> The social medium has been created for man by humanity.
> Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 157.

Specifically—(a) In painting, any liquid vehicle, as linseed-oil, poppy-oil, varnish, or water, with which dry pigments are ground, or with which pigments are mixed by the painter while at work, in order to give them greater fluidity. (b) In acoustics, a ponderable elastic substance, as air or other gas, water, etc., which transmits the energy of the sounding body in waves of condensation and rarefaction to the ear. (c) In heat and light, that which transmits the energy of the heated or luminous body to a distance in undulatory waves; the ether. (d) In bacteriology, the nutritive substance, either a liquid or a solid, in which or upon which the various forms of microscopic life are grown for study. The liquid media employed are infusions of hay, extract of beer-yeast, and broth of various kinds of meat. The solid media most used are eggs, slices of potatoes and carrots, agar-agar, and especially gelatin and the gelatinized serum of the blood of oxen. After being thoroughly sterilized by heat, they are usually placed in test-tubes, and inoculated with the form that it is desired to study; the cultures may then be observed through the glass.

3. A person through whom, or through whose agency, another acts; specifically, one who is supposed to be controlled in speech and action by the will of another person or a disembodied being, as in animal magnetism and spiritualism; an instrument for the manifestation of another personality. Many of the so-called spiritual mediums claim the power of acting upon and through matter, by means of the spirits controlling them, in a manner independent of ordinary material conditions and limitations. In this sense the plural mediums is preferred.

> Although particular persons adopted the profession of media between men and Elohim, there was no limitation of the power, in the view of ancient Israel, to any special class of the population.
> Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XIX. 354.

4. Something of mean or medium weight, size, etc. [Colloq.]

> The present classification of the cavalry of the line is as follows: thirteen regiments of Mediums, comprising the seven regiments of Dragoon Guards, numbered 1 to 7; etc.
> N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 111.
>
> The 4th Dragoon Guards are no longer "Heavies," but Mediums.
> N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 111.

Circulating medium, coin and bank-notes, or paper convertible into money on demand; currency.—Medium cæli, in astrol., midheaven; the meridian of the place of observation.—Medium of cognition, a cognition producing other cognition inferentially or quasi-inferentially. —Medium of form or of participation, in logic, something which partakes of the nature of both of two extremes.=Syn. 1. Average, Mediocrity, etc. See mean[3].

II. a. Middle; middling; mean: as, a man of medium size.=Syn. See mean[3], n.

mediumistic (mē′di-um-is′tik), a. Of or pertaining to spiritualistic mediums: as, mediumistic phenomena.

Private and unpaid "mediums," or other persons in whose presence mediumistic phenomena occur.
Amer. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 266.

mediumship (mē′di-um-ship), n. [< medium + -ship.] The state or condition of being a spiritualistic medium; the vocation or function of such a medium.

Animal magnetism, clairvoyance, mediumship, or mesmerism are antagonistic to this science.
Quoted in Contemporary Rev., LI. 803.

medium-sized (mē′di-um-sīzd), a. Of medium or middle size; of an intermediate or of an average size.

medius (mē′di-us), n. [ML. and NL. use of L. medius, middle: see medium.] In music: (a) In Gregorian music, an inflection, modulation, or deviation from monotone, used to mark a partial break in the text, as at the end of a clause. It consists of a downward step of a minor third. See accent, 8. (b†) A tenor or alto voice or voice-part; a mean.

The superius, medius, tenor, and bassus parts of . . .
Byrd's Gradualia. Athenæum, No. 3190, p. 821.

Medjidie (me-ji-dē′e, me-jid′i-e), n. [Turk. mejidi, < mejid, medjid (see def.), ('Abd-ul-mejid, glorious servant of God), < Ar. mejīd, glorious, < mejd, glory.] 1. A Turkish order of knighthood, instituted in 1852 by the sultan Abdul-Medjid, and conferred on many foreign officers who took part with Turkey in the Crimean war.—2. A Turkish silver coin equal to 20 piasters, named from the sultan Abdul-Medjid, who coined it in 1844; also a gold coin equivalent to 100 piasters; the lira (which see).

medjidite (me-jid′īt), n. [< Medjid (see def.) + -ite[2].] In mineral. (named after the sultan Abdul-Medjid), a hydrous sulphate of uranium and calcium, occurring with uraninite.

★medlar (med′lär), n. [Formerly also medler; < ME. medler, meddeler, < OF. medler, mesler, meslier (F. néflier), a medlar-tree, < mesle, mesple, F. dial. méle, also (with change of orig. m to n, as in map, nape[2], napkin, etc.) OF. nesple, neple*, F. nèfle = Sp. néspera = Pg. nespera = It. nespola, f., the medlar (fruit); cf. A small, generally bushy tree, Mespilus Germanica, related to the crab-apple, cultivated in gardens for its fruit. It is wild in central and southern Europe, but was introduced from western Asia. See Mespilus.

Leaves and Fruit of Medlar-tree (Mespilus Germanica).

Meddelers in hoote lande gladdest be,
So it be moist; thai come also in cold.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 121.

Witwoud grows by the Knight, like a Medlar grafted on a Crab. Congreve, Way of the World, i. 5.

2. The fruit of the above tree, resembling a small brown-skinned apple, but with a broad disk at the summit surrounded by the remains of the calyx-lobes. When first gathered, it is harsh and uneatable, but in the early stages of decay it acquires an acid flavor much relished by some. There are several varieties.

You'll be rotten ere you be half ripe, and that's the right virtue of the medler. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2. 123.

The stalk [of the cotton-wool plant], no bigger than that of wheat, but rough as the Beans; the head round and bearded, in size and shape of a medlar. Sandys, Travailes, p. 12.

Dutch medlar, the common variety of medlar.—Japanese medlar. Same as loquat, 2.—Neapolitan or Welsh medlar. See azarole.

medlar-tree (med′lär-trē), n. [Cf. ME. medleiree.] Same as medlar, 1.

medlar-wood (med′lär-wụd), n. Some hard-wooded species of Eugenia, growing in Mauritius and adjacent islands, as E. mespiloides.

medle[1]†, v. An obsolete form of meddle.

medle[2]†, n. [ME., < OF. mesle, mesple, medlar: see medlar.] A medlar: perhaps only in the compound medle-tree.

medlee†, n. and a. An obsolete form of medley.

medle-tree†, n. [ME.] Same as medlar-tree.

A sat and dinede in a wede,
Under a faire medle-tre.
Beves of Hamtoun, p. 52. (Halliwell.)

medley (med′li), n. and a. [Formerly also medly, medlie; < ME. medlee, medle, < OF. medlee, meslee, meilee, mellee, F. mêlée (> E. mêlée and melley) = Sp. mezcla = Pg. mescla, a mixing, orig. fem. of medle, mesle, etc., pp. of medler, mesler, mix: see meddle and mell[1].] I. n. 1. A mixture; a mingled and confused mass of elements, ingredients, or parts; a jumble; a hodgepodge.

Love is a medley of endearments, jars,
Suspicions, quarrels, reconcilements, wars;
Then peace again. Walsh.

They . . . will bear no more
This medley of philosophy and war.
Addison, Cato.

The ballet had been a favourite subject of court diversion since Beaujoyeaulx produced in 1581 Le Ballet Comique de la Royne, a medley of dancing, choral singing, and musical dialogue. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 87.

Every Woolen Weaver shall have . . . for every yard of Medlie 1d. Qs. Statute (1609), quoted in Ribton-Turner's [Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 444.

As Medleys are most made in other shires, as good Whites as any are woven in this county.
Fuller, Worthies, Wilts, II. 435. (Davies.)

4†. A hand-to-hand fight; a melley or mêlée.

As soone as the speres were spente, thei drough oute theire swerdes, and be-gonne the medle on foote and on horsebak. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 457.

=Syn. 1. Miscellany, Jumble, etc. See mixture.

II. a. 1. Mingled; confused.

Qualms at my heart, convulsions in my nerves,
Within my little world make medley war. Dryden.

A medley air
Of cunning and of impudence.
Wordsworth, Peter Bell.

2. Mixed; of a mixed stuff or color.

He rood but hoomly in a medlee coote.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 328.

medley† (med′li), v. t. [< medley, n.] To mix.

His heeir was grete and blakke, and foule medled.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 635.

A medled estate of the orders of the Gospel and the ceremonies of popery is not the best way to banish popery.
Quoted in Hooker's Eccles. Polity, iv. 8.

Médoc (me-dok′), n. [From Médoc, a region in France, in the department of Gironde.] A class of excellent French red Bordeaux wines, included under the English term of clarets, comprising the finest wines of the Bordeaux type, the Château Laffitte, Château Margaux, and Château La Tour, as well as many other brands of desirable quality and more moderate cost. All these wines have a delicate aroma, and a peculiar slightly bitterish flavor, and when pure are free from headiness.

medrick, madrick (med′rik, mad′rik), n. [Origin obscure.] The tern or sea-swallow.

A medrick that makes you look overhead
With short, sharp screams as he sights his prey.
Lowell, Appledore.

medrinack (med′ri-nak), n. [Also medrinaque, formerly in pl. medrinacks, medrinackes; appar. of native origin.] A coarse fiber from the Philippines, obtained from Saguerus pinnatus, the cabo negro palm, and used chiefly for stiffening dress-linings, etc.

medrissa (me-dris′ä), n. Same as madrasah.

medulla (mē-dul′ä), n. [= F. médulle = Sp. ★medula = Pg. medulla = It. medolla, midolla, < L. medulla, marrow, pith, kernel, < medius, middle: see medium.] 1. In anat. and zoöl.: (a) Marrow. [Little used.] (b) The so-called spinal marrow; the spinal cord, or central axis of the nervous system; the myelon: more fully called medulla spinalis. (c) The hindmost segment of the brain, continuous with the spinal cord; the afterbrain or metencephalon; the medulla oblongata. (d) The ventral ganglionic chain of the nervous system of some invertebrates, as Vermes, analogous to the spinal cord of vertebrates. (e) The pith of a hair. (f) The myelin, or white and fatty covering of the axis-cylinder of a nerve. (g) The marrow of a bone.—2. In bot., the pith of plants. (a) In exogens, the central column of parenchymatous tissue about which the wood is formed. (b) In heteromerous lichens, the innermost stratum of colorless tissue composing the thallus. It exhibits three well-marked forms: (1) the woolly, composed of simple or branched entangled filaments; (2) the crustaceous, which is tartareous in appearance; (3) the cellulose, which consists of angular, rounded, or oblong cellules.—Columns of the medulla oblongata. See column.—Medulla oblongata. See def. 1 (c); see also brain.—Medulla spinalis. See def. 1 (b).

medullar (mē-dul′är), a. [= F. médullaire = Sp. medular = Pg. medullar = It. midollare, < LL. medullaris, situated in the marrow, < L. medulla, marrow: see medulla.] Same as medullary. [Rare.]

These little emissaries, united together at the cortical part of the brain, make the medullar part, being a bundle of very small, threadlike channels of fibres.
G. Cheyne, Philosophical Principles.

★medullary (med′u-lā-ri), a. [As medullar.] 1. In anat. and zoöl., pertaining to marrow or medulla, or resembling it in form or position; myelonal: as, medullary substance; a medullary cavity; medullary cancer; a medullary foramen.—2. In bot., composing or pertaining to the medulla or pith of plants. See phrases below.—Medullary axis, in lichens, same as medullary layer.—Medullary cancer. Same as encephaloid cancer (which see, under encephaloid).—Medullary cavity, in embryol.: (a) The hollow of the primitively tubular spinal cord.

The primitive medullary cavity, which persists as the central canal, remains open in the lumbar swelling of birds. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat., p. 512.

(b) The hollow of a bone which contains marrow.—Medullary foramen. See foramen.—Medullary furrow or groove, in embryol., the primitive trace or furrow of a vertebrate embryo, or a corresponding formation in an invertebrate: so called from being the site of a future medulla.

As the medullary groove deepens, its edges become more sharply defined, and its inner border comes close down to the entoderm, thus forcing asunder the two halves of the mesoderm. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 174.

Medullary layer, in lichenol. See medulla, 2 (b).—Medullary plate, in embryol., one of the lips of the medullary groove.—Medullary rays, the radiating vertical bands or plates of parenchymatous tissue in the stems of exogenous plants, popularly called the silver-grain.

Medullary Rays.

1. Longitudinal radial section through the wood of a branch of maple one year old: P, pith; B, bark. 2. Longitudinal tangential section of the same wood, showing the ends of the medullary rays.

There are two kinds—the primary, which extend from the pith (medulla) to the cortex, and the secondary, which are shorter than the primary. The rays may be simple, consisting of a single row or a single layer of superimposed cells, as in many conifers; or compound, consisting of more than one layer of superimposed cells, as in most dicotyledons.—Medullary sheath, in bot., a narrow zone made up of the innermost layer of woody tissue immediately surrounding the pith in plants.—Medullary tube, the cerebrospinal cord in the primitive tubular stage.

medullated (med′u-lā-ted), a. [< L. medulla, marrow, + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] Having a medulla.

The [spinal] cord will be seen to be mainly made up of medullated nerve-fibres. Martin, Human Body, p. 177.

medullin (mē-dul′in), n. [< L. medulla, pith, + -in[2].] A name given by Braconnot to the cellulose obtained from the pith or medulla of certain plants, as the sunflower and lilac.

medullispinal (mē-dul-i-spī′nal), a. [< L. medulla, marrow, pith, + spina, spine: see spinal.] Pertaining to the medulla spinalis, spinal marrow, or spinal cord.

The medullispinal or proper veins of the spinal cord lie within the dura mater. Holden, Anat. (1885), p. 794.

medullitis (med-u-lī′tis), n. [NL., < medulla, marrow, + -itis.] In pathol., same as myelitis.

medullose (med′u-lōs), a. [= F. médulleux = Sp. meduloso = Pg. medulloso = It. midolloso, < L. medullosus, full of marrow, < medulla, marrow, pith: see medulla.] Having the texture of pith. Maunder.

Medusa (mē-dū′sä), n. [L. Medusa, < Gr. Μέδουσα, a fem. name, orig. fem. of μέδων, a ruler, ppr. of μέδειν, rule.] 1. In Gr. myth., one of the three Gorgons, the only one of them who was mortal. She was slain by Perseus, with the aid of Athena; and her serpent-entwined head was so awful that its sight turned all beholders to stone. It was afterward borne by Athena on her ægis or on her shield. The later artists beautified the grimacing head of Medusa, retaining only the writhing serpents of the legend. See Gorgon and ægis.

2. Pl. medusæ (-sē). In zoöl.: (a) [l. c.] A jelly-fish, sea-jelly, or sea-nettle; an acaleph, in a strict sense; a discophoran or discophorous hydrozoan; any member of the family Medusidæ or order or subclass Discophora: a term very loosely used, and now chiefly as an English word. See medusoid, n. (b) [cap.] [NL.] An old genus of jelly-fishes, used with great and varying latitude, more or less nearly equivalent to the order Discophora or family Medusidæ, now greatly restricted or entirely discarded. In the latter case Aurelia is used instead. See cut under acaleph. [In this sense there is no plural.] (c) [l. c.] Some hydrozoan resembling or supposed to be one of the foregoing; a medusoid: as, the naked-eyed medusæ of Forbes, which are the reproductive zoöids or gonophores of gymnoblastic hydroids.

medusa-bell (mē-dū′sȧ-bel), n. The swimming-bell, gelatinous disk, or umbrella of a medusa.

medusa-bud (mē-dū′sȧ-bud), n. A budding medusa; a rudimentary medusa, or one not detached from its stock, forming a generative bud or gonophore.

Medusæ (mē-dū′sē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Medusa.] Jelly-fishes, acalephs proper, or discophorans, as a family or higher group of the Hydrozoa, equivalent to Medusidæ or Discophora, 1.

medusal (mē-dū′sal), a. [< NL. Medusa + -al.] Same as medusan. Nature, XXXVIII. 356.

medusan (mē-dū′sȧn), a. and n. [< NL. Medusa + -an.] I. a. Of, pertaining to, or resembling a member of the family Medusidæ.

II. n. A hydrozoan of the family Medusidæ.

Medusa's-head (mē-dū′sȧz-hed), n. 1. A basket-fish, basket-urchin, or sea-basket; a euryalean ophiurian or branching sandstar of the family Astrophytidæ. Also medusa-head and medusa-headstar. See cut under basket-fish.—2. An extant crinoid of the genus Pentacrinus, P. caput-medusæ.—3. In bot., the plant Euphorbia Caput-Medusæ.—Medusa's-head orchis. See orchis.

medusian (mē-dū′si-ȧn), a. and n. [< NL. Medusa + -ian.] Same as medusan.

Medusidæ (mē-dū′si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Medusa + -idæ.] The medusæ, acalephs, discophorans, or jelly-fishes, as a family of Hydrozoa, typified by the genus Medusa proper. The hydrosome is free and oceanic, consisting of a single nectocalyx or swimming-bell, from the roof of which one or several polypites are suspended. The nectocalyx is furnished with a system of canals, and a number of tentacles depend from its margin. The reproductive organs appear as processes either of the sides of the polypite or of the nectocalycine canals. The family as thus defined is coextensive with the order or subclass Discophora, and equivalent to Meduseæ, 2 (b), but the term is often used in a much more restricted sense, as synonymous with Aureliidæ.

medusidan (mē-dū′si-dȧn), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Medusidæ.

II. n. One of the Medusidæ.

medusiform (mē-dū′si-fôrm), a. [< NL. Medusa + L. forma, form.] Resembling a medusa in form; medusoid; in the form of a bell; campanulate.—Medusiform bud, a budding medusoid contained in the gonophore of some hydrozoans.

Medusiform Zoöid of Campanularia.

A, nectocalyx; A′, velum; σ, lithocysts; te, tentacles; k′, manubrium; k″, radial canals; o, mouth.

medusite (mē-dū′sīt), n. [< NL. Medusites, < Medusa + -ites, E. *-ite*2.] A fossil medusa or acaleph. Notwithstanding the softness of jelly-fishes, fossil traces of some have been found in various rock-formations.

Medusites (med-ū-sī′tēz), n. [NL.: see medusite.] A generic name of certain fossil medusæ.

medusoid (mē-dū′soid), a. and n. [< NL. Medusa + Gr. εἶδος, form.] I. a. Like a medusa; resembling a medusa in form or function; medusiform: as, a medusoid bud; the medusoid organization. Sometimes acalephoid.—Medusoid bud, the generative bud or gonophore of a fixed or free hydrozoan.

II. n. 1. The medusiform generative bud or receptacle of the reproductive elements of a hydrozoan, whether it becomes detached or not. Such an organism constitutes the middle stage in the process of metagenesis. The gonophore may present every stage of development and degree of complication until it becomes medusiform or bell-shaped, when it is called a medusoid from its resemblance to a medusa or jelly-fish.

2. Loosely, any medusa, medusidan, or medusoid organism.

The name, from the German for 'sea-foam,' alludes to the lightness and the snow-white color. It is found in various regions, but occurs chiefly in Asia Minor, Livadia, and the island of Eubœa. When first taken out it is soft, and makes lather like soap. It is manufactured into tobacco-pipes, which, after being carved or turned, are baked to dry them, then boiled in milk, polished, and finally boiled in oil or wax. Artificial meerschaum is made from the chips and waste left from meerschaum-cutting, consolidated by pressure. Meerschaum is imitated also in plaster of Paris, treated with paraffin and colored with gamboge and dragon's-blood, and in other ways.

2. A pipe made from this substance. Such pipes are valued from their taking a rich brown color from the oil of tobacco gradually absorbed by the material.

So that the mete & the masse watz metely delyuered.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1414.

I account the Mirrour of Magistrates meetely furnished of beautiful parts. Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

2. Measurably; tolerably.

And it is yet of a metely good strengthe, and it was called in olde tyme Effrata.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 35.

meetness (mēt'nes), n. [< meet[2] + -ness.] The state or quality of being meet; fitness; suitableness; propriety.

meg-, mega-. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, big: see mickle, much.] In physics, a prefix to a unit of measurement to denote the unit taken a million times: as, a *meg*ohm, a *meg*avolt, etc.

megabacteria (meg″a-bak tē'ri-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + NL. bacteria, q. v.] The largest kind of bacteria: distinguished from microbacteria. Ziegler, Pathol. Anat., i. 185.

megabasite (meg-ą-bā'sīt), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + βάσις, base, + -ite[2].] In mineral., a tungstate of iron and manganese, probably a variety of wolfram.

megacephalic (meg″a-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κεφαλή, head, + -ic.] Large-headed: specifically applied in craniometry to skulls whose cranial capacity exceeds 1450 cubic centimeters.

Megacephalon (meg-ą-sef'ą-lon), n. [NL. (C. J. Temminck, 1844), < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κεφαλή, head.] A genus of mound-birds or brush-turkeys of Celebes, of the family Megapodiidæ and subfamily Talegallinæ; the maleos: so called from the size of the head, which results from an expansion of the cranial walls into a kind of helmet. M. maleo is the only species.

megacephalous (meg-ą-sef'a-lus), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κεφαλή, head.] Large-headed; megacephalic in general. Also megalocephalous.

Megaceros (me-gas'ę-ros), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κέρας, horn.] The genus of large extinct Cervidæ of which the Irish elk or deer is the type, having immense palmated antlers. The animal has been called Cervus megaceros, C. hibernicus, and Megaceros hibernicus, but is now known as Cervus giganteus. It is related to the elk of Europe and the moose of America, but is much larger.

megacerous (me-gas'ę-rus), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κέρας, horn.] Having very large horns, as the extinct Irish elk.

Megachile (meg-ą-kī'lē), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + χεῖλος, lip.] A genus of aculeate hymenopterous insects, or bees, of the family Apidæ and group Dasygastræ; the leaf-cutters. It is a large genus, of world-wide distribution, containing many species of varied habits: all furnish their cells with bits of leaves cut from trees and plants, which they stick together and roll into cases to form their larval cells in the trunks of dead trees and old rotting palings. The nest of M. muraria is composed of grains of sand glued together with its viscid saliva, and is so hard as not to be easily penetrated by a knife. About 50 European and as many North American species are known. M. centuncularis is one of the common species of Europe and North America.

Megachilidæ (meg-ą-kil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Megachile + -idæ.] The leaf-cutting bees regarded as a family.

Megachiroptera (meg″ą-kī-rop'tę-rą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of megachiropterus: see megachiropterous.] Same as Macrochiroptera. G. E. Dobson.

megachiropteran (meg″ą-kī-rop'tę-ran), a. and n. [< Megachiroptera + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Megachiroptera, or having their characters; being a fruit-bat.

II. n. A member of the Megachiroptera; a fruit-bat.

megachiropterous (meg″ą-kī-rop'tę-rus), a. [< NL. megachiropterus, < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + χείρ, hand, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather: see chiropterous.] Same as megachiropteran.

megacocci (meg-ą-kok'sī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + κόκκος, a berry: see coccus.] The largest kind of cocci: distinguished from micrococci.

megacosm (meg'ą-kozm), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + κόσμος, world.] Same as macrocosm.

> I desire him to give me leave to set forth our microcosm, man, in some such deformed way as he doth the megacosm, or great world.
>
> Bp. Croft, Animad. on Burnet's Theory (1685), p. 138. (Latham.) megaderm (meg'ą-dėrm), n. [< NL. Megaderma.] A bat of the family Megadermatidæ.

Megaderma (meg-ą-dėr'mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + δέρμα, the skin: see derma.] The typical genus of the family Megadermatidæ (or subfamily Megadermatinæ of Nycteridæ). M. gigas of Australia is the largest bat of the suborder Microchiroptera, the forearm measuring 4½ inches. M. lyra is a smaller species, common in India. There are several others.

Megadermatidæ (meg″ą-dėr-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Megaderma(t-) + -idæ.] The Megadermatinæ rated as a family.

Megadermatinæ (meg-ą-dėr-mą-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megaderma(t-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of bats of the family Nycteridæ, typified by the genus Megaderma; the megaderms.

Megaderus (me-gad'ę-rus), n. [NL. (Serville, 1834), < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + δέρη, neck, throat.] A genus of longicorns or cerambycids having the three sternal sclerites continuous. They exhale a strong, peculiar odor, though no odoriferous glands have been discovered. They are mostly tropical American, but M. bifasciatus occurs in Texas.

★megadont (meg'ą-dont), a. [Irreg. < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] Having large teeth. W. H. Flower.

megadyne (meg'ą-dīn), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see mega-), + E. dyne, q. v.] A unit equal to a million dynes.

megaerg (meg'ą-èrg), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see mega-), + E. erg, q. v.] A unit equal to a million ergs. Also megerg, megalerg.

megafarad (meg'ą-far-ad), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see mega-), + E. farad, q. v.] In electrometry, a unit equal to a million farads.

Megalæma (meg-ą-lē'mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + λαιμός, throat (breast).] The typical genus of Megalæmidæ or scansorial barbets. The species of Megalæma proper are Asiatic. M. hæmacephala, the crimson-breasted barbet, is a common Indian one, known as the tambagut or coppersmith. Also Megalaima, as originally by G. R. Gray in 1842.

Megalæmidæ (meg-ą-lē'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Megalæma + -idæ.] A family of chiefly Old World non-passerine picarian birds, formerly confused with the barbets proper or puff-birds (Bucconidæ) of America; scansorial barbets. The technical characters are—the homalogonatous and antiopelmous musculation of the zygodactylous feet; a single carotid; no cæca; tufted elæodochon; acute manubrium sterni; bifurcate vomer; and ten rectrices. The term is synonymous with Capitonidæ. The megalemes are nearly related to the toucans and woodpeckers. They are of small to moderate size, of stout form, with large heads and heavy bills garnished with long bristles, in the latter respect resembling the barbets of the family Bucconidæ. The coloration is highly variegated and often brilliant. Some 80 species are described, chiefly Asiatic and African, only a few occurring in South America. The family is divided into Pogonorhynchinæ, Megalæminæ, and Capitoninæ.

megaleme (meg'ą-lēm), n. A scansorial barbet of the genus Megalæma, in a broad sense. Also megalæme, megalaime.

megalerg (meg'ą-lèrg), n. [< Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great (see mega-), + E. erg.] Same as megaerg.

Megalesian, Megalensian (meg-ą-lē'si-ąn, -len'si-ąn), a. [< L. Megalesia, prop. Megalensia (< Gr. Μεγαλήσια, a festival in honor of the Magna Mater or Cybele), neut. pl. of Megalensis, pertaining to Megale, < Gr. Μεγάλη, 'the Great,' an epithet of the Magna Mater, fem. of μέγας (μεγαλ-), great: see main[2], mickle, much.] Of or belonging to Cybele, the Great Mother.—Megalesian games, in Rom. antiq., a magnificent festival, with a stately procession, feasting, and scenic performances in the theaters, celebrated at Rome in the month of April, and lasting for six days, in honor of Cybele. The image of this goddess was brought to Rome from Pessinus in Galatia, about 203 B. C., and the games were instituted then or shortly afterward, in consequence of a sibylline oracle promising continual victory to the Romans if due honors were paid to her.

megalesthete (meg-ą-les'thēt), n. [< Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + αἰσθητής, one who perceives: see esthete, esthetic.] A supposed tactile organ of the chitons. Also written megalæsthete. H. N. Moseley.

Megalichthys (meg-ą-lik'this), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + ἰχθύς, fish.] A genus of large fossil ganoid fishes of Carboniferous age, established by Agassiz. By Günther the genus is referred to the family Saurodipteridæ, suborder Polypteroidei; by others to families called Saurodipterini and Saurichthyidæ or generally now to the Osteolepidæ. It was characterized by large, smooth, but minutely punctured, enameled scales, some of which have been found 5 inches in diameter, indicating a fish of great size. The jaws were furnished with immense laniary teeth. Several species have been described from Great Britain and North America.

megalith (meg'ą-lith), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + λίθος, stone.] A great stone; specifically, a stone of great size used in constructive work or as a monument, as in ancient Cyclopean and so-called Druidic or Celtic remains.

> Hundreds of our countrymen rush annually to the French megaliths.
> J. Fergusson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 181, note.

megalithic (meg-ą-lith'ik), a. [< megalith + -ic.] Consisting of megaliths or very large stones: as, megalithic monuments; the megalithic architecture of Egypt. The word megalithic, however, as now almost exclusively used, has reference to a peculiar class of monuments or remains, of which the most essential feature is that the stones used in their construction in a vast majority of cases have nearly or quite their natural form. Hence these remains, in so far as they consist of stone, have been designated as "rude stone monuments." The stones used in them are frequently, but not always, of very large size. The menhir and dolmen are perhaps the most characteristic of the various forms of megalithic construction (see these words), but circles and avenues or alinements of standing stones, as well as tumuli or barrows of earth, either covering or inclosing dolmens, and frequently surrounded by one or more rows or circles of upright stones, are almost equally common and characteristic. The region especially notable for the number and variety of its megalithic remains extends from northern Africa through France and Great Britain to Scandinavia. The most remarkable display of the various forms is in Algiers, in Brittany, in Cornwall and various districts in southwestern England and Wales, as well as in parts of Ireland and Scotland; also in northern Germany, Denmark, and southern Scandinavia. There are also great numbers of dolmens and tumuli in India, especially in the hills of Khassia, where such monuments are still being erected.

> To the same primitive period [the Neolithic] of rude savage life must be assigned the rudiments of architectural skill pertaining to the Megalithic Age. Everywhere we find traces, alike throughout the seats of oldest civilisation and in earliest written records, including the historical books of the Old Testament Scriptures, of the erection of the simple monolith, or unhewn pillar of stone, as a record of events, a monumental memorial, or a landmark.

> But it is in Egypt that megalithic architecture is seen in its most matured stage, with all the massiveness which so aptly symbolises barbarian power. Encyc. Brit., II. 338.

> The megalithic structures, menhirs, cromlechs, dolmens, and the like . . . have been kept up as matters of modern construction and recognized purpose among the ruder indigenous tribes of India. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, I. 55.

megallantoid (meg-a-lan'toid), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + NL. allantois, q. v.] Having a large allantois.

Megalobatrachus (meg″ą-lō-bat'rą-kus), n. [NL. (Tschudi), < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + βάτραχος, a frog: see batrachian.] An Asiatic genus of the family Protonopsidæ (or Cryptobranchidæ), having four small but well-formed feet, and no gill-slits; the giant salamanders. M. maximus is the largest living amphibian, attaining a length of three feet or more. It is found in Japan. The proper generic name is Sieboldia.

megalocarpous (meg″ą-lō-kär'pus), a. [< Gr. μεγαλόκαρπος, having large fruit, < μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + καρπός, fruit.] Having large fruit.

megalocephalous (meg″ą-lō-sef'ą-lus), a. Same as megacephalic.

What Thurnam calls medium brains range in weight between 40 and 52½ ounces for men and 35 and 47½ ounces for women. All brains in size above this are called megalocephalous. Sci. Amer., N. S., LXI. 289.

megalocyte (meg'ą-lō-sīt), n. [< Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + κύτος, a cavity: see cyte.] A large blood-corpuscle, measuring from 12 to 15 micromillimeters in diameter, found in the human blood in cases of anemia, especially of pernicious anemia.

megalogonidium (meg″ą-lō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. megalogonidia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + NL. gonidium.] Same as macrogonidium.

megalograph (meg'ą-lō-gràf), n. [< Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + γράφειν, write.] A form of camera lucida used for microscopic drawing, or for industrial pattern-drawing, as from designs formed by the kaleidoscope. It admits of drawing directly from the microscopic or kaleidoscopic image.

megalography (meg-ą-log'rą-fi), n. [< Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A drawing of pictures to a large scale. Bailey, 1731.

megalomania (meg'ą-lō-mā″ni-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, + μανία, madness: see mania.] A form of insane delusion the subjects of which imagine themselves to be very great, exalted, or powerful personages; the delusion of grandeur.

Megalonyx (me-gal'ō-niks), n. [NL. (Thomas Jefferson, 1797), so called from the great size of its claw-bones; < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + ὄνυξ, a claw.] 1. A genus of gigantic extinct Pleistocene edentate quadrupeds related to the sloths, belonging to the family Mylodontidæ (sometimes, however, referred to the Megatheriidæ), having the foremost tooth in each jaw large and separated from the others by a wide diastema. M. cuvieri is one of the best-known species.—2. [l. c.] An individual ★or a species of this genus.

megalopa (meg-ą-lō'pä), n. Same as megalops, 2.

megalophonous (meg″ą-lō-fō'nus), a. [< Gr. μεγαλόφωνος, having a loud voice, < μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, + φωνή, voice.] 1. Having a loud voice; vociferous; clamorous. [Rare.]—2. Of grand or imposing sound. [Rare.]

> This is at once more descriptive and more megalophonous.
> Note on Shelley's Peter Bell the Third, Prol.

Megalophonus (meg″ą-lō-fō'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. μεγαλόφωνος, having a loud voice: see megalophonous.] A genus of larks, of the family Alaudidæ, founded by G. R. Gray in 1841 upon certain African species which have naked nostrils and are colored like quails, as M. apiatus (or clamosa): so called from being megalophonous. Also called Corypha.

megalopic (meg-ą-lop'ik), a. [< Gr. μεγαλωπός, large-eyed, < μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + ὤψ, eye: see optic. Cf. Megalops.] Having large eyes; specifically, of crustaceans, having the character of a megalops.

Megalopinæ (meg″ą-lō-pī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megalops (Megalop-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of elopine fishes without pseudobranchiæ, and with large scales and a long anal fin, represented by the genus Megalops. They are known as tarpons (or tarpums) and jew-fish.

megalopine (meg'ą-lō-pin), a. and n. I. a. Of, pertaining to, or having the characters of the Megalopinæ.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Megalopinæ.

megalopolis† (meg-ą-lop'ō-lis), n. [< Gr. μεγαλόπολις, a great city, metropolis (also the name of several cities), < μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + πόλις, city: see police.] A chief city; a metropolis.

> Paul and his wife are back in the precincts of megalopolis. M. Collins, The Ivory Gate, II. 211. (Encyc. Dict.)

Megalops (meg'ą-lops), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + ὤψ, eye: see megalopic.] 1. A genus of fishes, of the family Elopidæ. M. cyprinoides is common in the East Indies. M. atlanticus, the great tarpon of Florida, is now referred to the genus Tarpon.—2. [l. c.] A spurious genus of decapod crustaceans, representing a stage in the development of crabs in which the eyes are enormous. The term is retained as the designation of this condition, commonly known as the megalops or megalops stage. First called megalopa (W. E. Leach, 1815).

Megalops Stage of Shore crab (Carcinus mænas).

In the higher Decapoda the zoea frequently gives rise to a Megalops, with very large, stalked eyes, and the complete number of appendages, from which, by a series of moults, the adult form is produced. Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 11.

3. A genus of rove-beetles or staphylinids, containing a few small species of America and Africa. Dejean, 1833.—4. A genus of reptiles.

megalopsia (meg-ạ-lop′si-ạ), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + ὤψ, eye.] A pathological condition of the eyes in which objects appear enlarged.

megalopsychy (meg″ạ-lop-sī′ki), n. [⟨ Gr. μεγαλοψυχία, greatness of soul, ⟨ μεγαλόψυχος, great-souled, high-souled, ⟨ μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, + ψυχή, soul.] Magnanimity; greatness of soul. Blount. [Rare.]

Megaloptera (meg-ạ-lop′tę-rạ), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + πτερόν, wing, = E. feather.] A tribe of Neuroptera, containing the families Myrmeleontidæ, Hemerobiidæ, and Mantispidæ. Latreille, 1803.

Megalopteris (meg-ạ-lop′tę-ris), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, + πτερίς, a fern.] A genus of fossil ferns established by Dawson (1871), which is related to Neuropteris by its nervation, and to Alethopteris by the position of the leaflets. The fronds are very large and simply pinnate. This genus (according to Lesquereux not separable from Danæopsis except by the characters of the venation) is found in beds of supposed Devonian age in New Brunswick, and in the Carboniferous, especially the Pottsville formations, of the Appalachian trough and the Mississippi valley. Megalopteris is one of the earliest and most remarkable of a large group, including Neuropteris, Alethopteris, etc. (referred to the Neuropterideæ or Megalopterideæ), whose nearest living fern allies are the Marattiaceæ, but whose internal structure causes it to be placed in the Cycadofilices.

Megalornis (meg-ạ-lôr′nis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + ὄρνις, bird.] 1. Same as Grus, 1. G. R. Gray, 1840.—2. A genus of huge fossil birds founded by Seeley upon a fragmentary tibia from the Eocene of Sheppey, England. It was the same specimen that had been referred to Lithornis by Bowerbank, the true Lithornis of Owen, 1841 being regarded as different. A species has been called M. emuinus, from its supposed relationship to the emu.

megalosaur (meg′ạ-lō-sâr), n. [⟨ NL. Megalosaurus.] A dinosaur of the family Megalosauridæ.

megalosaurian (meg″ạ-lō-sâ′ri-ạn), a. and n. [⟨ NL. Megalosaurus + -ian.] I. a. Having the characters of a megalosaur.

II. n. A megalosaur.

Megalosauridæ (meg″ạ-lō-sâ′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Megalosaurus + -idæ.] A family of dinosaurians with biconcave vertebræ, pubes slender and united distally, and fore and hind feet, three- and four-toed respectively.

megalosauroid (meg″ạ-lō-sâ′roid), a. and n. [⟨ NL. Megalosaurus + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Same as megalosaurian.

Megalosaurus (meg″ạ-lō-sâ′rus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] A genus of dinosaurian reptiles, typical of the family Megalosauridæ, established by Buckland upon remains indicating a gigantic terrestrial reptile of carnivorous habits. The size has been variously estimated at from 30 to 40 and even 50 feet in length. The femur and tibia were each about 3 feet long. The remains of megalosaurs have been found in abundance in the Oölite.

Skull of Megalosaurus.

1, Megalosaurus (restored); 2, tooth; 3, part of jaw.

megalosplenia (meg″ạ-lō-splē′ni-ạ), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + σπλήν, the milt, spleen.] In pathol., enlargement of the spleen.

Megalotinæ (meg″ạ-lō-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Megalotis + -inæ.] A subfamily of Canidæ, represented by the genus Megalotis, having enormously large ears, three true tubercular molars of upper jaw, and short sectorial teeth of both jaws.

megalotine (meg-ạ-lō′tin), a. [⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, large, + οὖς (ὠτ-) = E. ear[1].] Having large ears, as a fox; specifically, of or pertaining to the Megalotinæ.

Megalotis (meg-ạ-lō′tis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας (μεγαλ-), great, + οὖς (ὠτ-) = E. ear[1].] 1. The typical genus of Megalotinæ, founded by Illiger in 1811. M. lalandi is the large-eared fox of Africa. The genus is also named Agriodus and Otocyon.—2. A genus of African and Indian larks of the family Alaudidæ, named by Swainson in 1827. Seo Pyrrhulauda.

Megamastictora (meg″ạ-mas-tik′tō-rạ), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, + μαστίκτωρ, a scourger, ⟨ μαστίζειν, whip, flog, scourge, ⟨ μάστιξ (μαστιγ-), a whip, scourge.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, one of two main branches of the phylum Parazoa or Spongiæ, characterized by the comparatively large size of the choanocytes, which are 0.005 to 0.009 millimeter in diameter; the chalk-sponges: contrasted with Micromastictora.

megamastictoral (meg″ạ-mas-tik′tō-rạl), a. [⟨ Megamastictora + -al.] Having large choanocytes, as a chalk-sponge; of or pertaining to the Megamastictora.

Megamys (meg′ạ-mis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, large, + μῦς, mouse.] A genus of immense hystricomorphic rodents from the Eocene of South America, of the family Chinchillidæ. D'Orbigny.

★megaphone (meg′ạ-fōn), n. [⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, + φωνή, sound. Cf. megalophonous.] An instrument devised by Edison for assisting hearing, adapted for use by deaf persons or for the perception of ordinary sounds at great distances. It consists essentially of two large funnel-shaped receivers for collecting the sound-waves, which are conducted to the ear by flexible tubes.

Megaphyton (me-gaf′i-ton), n. [NL. (Artis, 1825), ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, large, + φυτόν, plant.] A fossil fern-stem found in the coal-measures of Europe and America. This fossil belongs to the trunk of a tree-fern, and is marked by large scars, which are sometimes nearly square in outline and sometimes transversely oval, and placed in opposite biserial rows. The cicatricial disks usually exhibit horseshoe-shaped impressions, the transections of the vascular system. This fern occasionally grew to a very considerable size.

megapod (meg′ạ-pod), a. and n. [⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, large, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot. Cf. Gr. μεγαλόπους, having large feet.] I. a. Having large feet: specifically applied to the Megapodiidæ.

II. n. One of the Megapodiidæ.

megapodan (me-gap′ō-dan), a. and n. Same as megapod.

megapode (meg′ạ-pōd), n. Same as megapod. A. Newton.

Megapodidæ (meg-ạ-pod′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Megapodius + -idæ.] Same as Megapodiidæ.

Megapodiidæ (meg″ạ-pō-dī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Megapodius + -idæ.] A family of peristeropodous alectoromorphous birds of the order Gallinæ, typified by the genus Megapodius; the megapods or mound-birds; the jungle-fowls of Australia. They have relatively large feet, with four toes on a level, as in the American curassows or Cracidæ, which latter the megapods represent in the Australasian region. They are known as mound-birds from their singular and characteristic habit of scraping up heaps of soil and decaying vegetable substances, in which the eggs are buried and left to be hatched by the heat of the decomposing mass. The eggs are buried to the depth of several feet. The chicks hatch feathered and able to fly. The birds inhabit brush and scrub, usually by the seaside, and go sometimes in pairs, sometimes in large companies. They are about the size of common fowl, and are generally of somber color. The family is divided into Megapodiinæ and Talegallinæ. See these words, and Megapodius. Usually Megapodidæ.

Mound-bird (Megapodius tumulus).

Megapodiinæ (meg-ạ-pō-di-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Megapodius + -inæ.] A subfamily of Megapodiidæ contrasting with Talegallinæ, containing two genera, Megapodius and Leipoa; mound-birds or megapods proper.

Megapodius (meg-ạ-pō′di-us), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, large, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] The typical and principal genus of Megapodiidæ, established by Quoy and Gaimard in 1824. It contains all the Megapodiinæ excepting Leipoa ocellata —in all upward of 20 species. The Australian M. tumulus, figured above, is a characteristic example.

megapolis† (me-gap′ō-lis), n. [⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, + πόλις, city. Cf. megalopolis.] A metropolis.

Amadavad . . . is at this present the magapolis of Cambaya. Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 64.

Megaptera (me-gap′tę-rạ), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, + πτερόν, wing, = E. feather. Cf. Megaloptera.] A genus of furrowed whalebone-whales, the humpbacks, belonging to the family Balænopteridæ, and typical of the subfamily Megapterinæ, established by J. E. Gray in 1846. They have a low dorsal fin, folds of skin on the throat, free cervical vertebræ, short broad baleen plates, and very long narrow flippers with only four digits. Numerous species have been described, from all seas, but probably there are only two or three.

Megapterinæ (me-gap-tę-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Megaptera + -inæ.] A subfamily of Balænopteridæ or finner-whales, typified by the genus Megaptera; the humpbacks. The low dorsal fin forms a characteristic hump on the back; the long manus has the four digits composed of numerous phalanges, and the throat is plicated. The genera are three: Megaptera, Poescopia, and Eschrichtius.

megapterine (me-gap′tę-rin), a. and n. [As Megaptera + -ine[1].] I. a. Having long fins, as a finner-whale; belonging to the Megapterinæ.

II. n. A member of the Megapterinæ.

Megarhynchus (meg-ạ-ring′kus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, large, + ῥύγχος, snout, bill.] A genus of American tyrant flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidæ, of which M. pitangua of Brazil is the type, characterized by an enormous bill. M. mexicanus of Mexico and Central America and M. chrysogaster of Ecuador are other species. The genus was named by Thunberg in 1824, and is also called Scaphorhynchus, Platyrhynchus, and Megastoma.

Megarhynchus pitangua, life-size.

Megarian (me-gā′ri-ạn), a. [⟨ L. Megara, ⟨ Gr. Μέγαρα, pl., Megara (appar. pl. of μέγαρον, hall, chamber, in pl. palace, caves (cells or chapel) of Demeter: see megaron), + -ian.] Of or belonging to Megara, a city of ancient Greece, or to Megaris, a territory between Attica and Corinth, of which it was the capital; Megaric.—Megarian school, a school of philosophy founded at Megara about 400 B. C. by Euclid, a native of that city, and a disciple of Socrates. The philosophers of this school taught that the only reality is the incorporeal essence; that the material world has no real existence; that change is inconceivable; that only the actual is possible; that the good is the only real; and that virtue is the knowledge of the good. The school made much of sophisms, and cultivated a sort of logic of refutation, which gave it the name of the eristic or dialectical school.

Megaric (me-gar′ik), a. and n. [⟨ L. Megaricus, ⟨ Gr. Μεγαρικός, of Megara, ⟨ Μέγαρα, Megara.] I. a. Same as Megarian.

II. n. A Megarian philosopher, or a follower of the Megarian school.

megaron (meg′ạ-ron), n.; pl. megara (-rạ). [⟨ Gr. μέγαρον, a large room, a large building, a palace, ⟨ μέγας, great, large, spacious.] In Gr. archæol., specifically, the great central hall of the Homeric house or palace. In large houses of this early time there was a megaron for the men and for the entertainment of guests, and another, more secluded, for the women of the household. The plan and disposition of such megara, with the ceremonial family hearth in the middle, have been most clearly made out by the excavations of Schliemann and Dörpfeld at Tiryns in the Peloponnesus in 1884–5.

Megarrhiza (meg-ạ-rī′zạ), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μέγας, great, + ῥίζα, root.] A former genus of plants now included under Micrampelis. The species so separated differ from the others in their large turgid seeds, 15 to 30 millimeters long, and in the enormous development of their roots. See Echinocystis, bitter-root, 1, and chilli-coyote (under chilli).

megasclere (meg′a-sklēr), n. [< NL. megasclerus, < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + σκληρός, hard.] A supporting spicule of a sponge, forming a part of the skeleton. Megascleres are generally of large size, as indicated by the name, and usually contribute to the formation of a more or less consistent skeleton, while the microscleres or flesh-spicules serve only for the support of single cells: but the distinction is not possible in all cases.

megasclerous (meg′a-sklē-rus), a. [< megasclere + -ous.] Of or pertaining to a megasclere; having the character of a megasclere.

Megascolex (meg-a-skō′leks), n. [NL. (Templeton, 1845), < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + σκώληξ, a worm.] A genus of oligochætous annelids or worms of large size. The Ceylonese M. cæruleus is a yard long, and as thick as one's finger.

megascope (meg′a-skōp), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + σκοπεῖν, view.] 1. A modification of the solar microscope for the examination of bodies of considerable dimensions.—2. In photog., an enlarging camera.

megascopic (meg-a-skop′ik), a. [As megascope + -ic.] Perceptible through unaided vision; visible without the use of a powerful magnifying instrument, or with only the assistance of a pocket-lens: used in contrast to microscopic, with reference to objects or investigations in regard to which the use of a microscope is not required: as, the megascopic constituents of a rock; the megascopic structure of the brain; a megascopic examination of an object. Also macroscopic, macroscopical.

megascopical (meg-a-skop′i-kal), a. [< megascopic + -al.] Same as megascopic.

megascopically (meg-a-skop′i-kal-i), adv. By the naked eye; by superficial inspection as distinguished from minute or microscopic inspection; without the use of magnifiers. Also macroscopically.

Megascops (meg′a-skops), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, + σκώψ, a small kind of owl.] A genus of horned owls of the family Strigidæ, established by J. J. Kaup in 1848. The name is now adopted for the group of American species of which the common red or mottled owl of North America, usually called Scops asio, is the type.

megaseme (meg′a-sēm), a. and n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + σῆμα, sign.] I. a. In anthrop., having a large index; specifically in craniom., having an orbital index over 89 (Broca, Flower), or over 85 (German anthropologists); not microseme.

II. n. A skull having a large index.

Megasoma (meg-a-sō′mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + σῶμα, body.] 1. A genus of large cetonian coleopters, typical of the subfamily Megasominæ, having the prosternal process glabrous; Hercules-beetles or elephant-beetles. M. elephas, M. typhon, M. actæon, and M. thersites are American species of these huge beetles. All these are South American except M. thersites, which is Californian. They are the largest coleopters known. The genus was established by Kirby in 1825.

2. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Boisduval, 1836.

Megasominæ (meg″a-sō-mī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Megasoma + -inæ.] Swainson's name of the Hercules-beetles as a subfamily of Cetonidæ.

megasporange (meg′a-spō-ranj), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + σπόρος, a spore or seed, + ἀγγος, a vessel.] Same as macrosporangium.

megaspore (meg′a-spōr), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + σπόρος, seed.] Same as macrospore.

Some of the best seams of coal appear to have been chiefly formed by the accumulation of these Megaspores.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 347.

megass, megasse (me-gas′), n. Same as bagasse.

Megasthena (me-gas′the-nä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + σθένος, strength.] In Dana's classification of mammals, the second order of Mammalia. Dana divided this class into four orders: Archontia, man alone; Megasthena, the quadrumanous, carnivorous, herbivorous, and cetacean mammals; Microsthena, the chiropters, insectivores, rodents, and edentates; Oöticoidea, the marsupials and monotremes. The arrangement is the same as Owen's Archencephala, Gyrencephala, Lissencephala, and Lyencephala. Megasthena corresponds to Gyrencephala; also to Educabilia, exclusive of man. Also Megasthenes.

megasthene (meg′a-sthēn), n. One of the Megasthena; any quadrumanous, carnivorous, herbivorous, or cetacean mammal.

There is a close parallelism with the Mutilates, the lowest of the Megasthenes.
Amer. Jour. Sci., Jan., 1863, p. 71.

megasthenic (meg-a-sthen′ik), a. [< megasthene + -ic.] Having great strength of structural character; strongly organized; specifically, having the nature of or pertaining to the Megasthena.

This is in contrast with the fact among Crustaceans, the megasthenic and microsthenic divisions of which . . . stand widely apart. J. D. Dana, On Cephalization, p. 8.

megasynthetic (meg″a-sin-thet′ik), a. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + συνθετικός, putting together: see synthetic.] Same as polysynthetic. [Rare.]

megathere (meg′a-thēr), n. [< NL. megatherium.] A mammal of the family Megatheriidæ.

megatherian (meg-a-thē′ri-an), a. and n. [< NL. Megatherium + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the genus Megatherium.

II. n. A megathere.

Megatheridæ (meg-a-ther′i-dē), n. pl. Same as Megatheriidæ.

Megatheriidæ (meg″a-thē-rī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Megatherium + -idæ.] A family of extinct gigantic edentate animals of the order Bruta, related to the sloths and ant-eaters, the remains of which occur abundantly in Pleistocene deposits of North and South America; the ground-sloths. The teeth are usually 10 in the upper jaw and 8 in the lower, as in the sloths—in the genus Cælodon 8 in the upper jaw and 6 in the lower. The typical and leading genera are Megatherium and Scelidotherium: many others are sometimes referred to this family, sometimes to Mylodontidæ, etc.

megatherioid (meg-a-thē′ri-oid), a. and n. [< Megatherium + -oid.] I. a. Resembling or having the characters of a megathere; belonging to the Megatheriidæ.

II. n. A megathere or some similar mammal. Also megatheroid.

Megatherium (meg-a-thē′ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέγας, great, large, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] 1. The typical genus of the family Megatheriidæ, containing huge extinct sloths larger than a rhinoceros. They had 10 teeth in the upper jaw, and 8 in the lower, deeply implanted, persistently growing, prismatic, and with such an arrangement of the vasodentine, dentine, and cement that as they wore away the triturating surfaces continued to present a pair of transverse ridges. One of the best-known species is M. americanum, the skeleton of which measures 18 feet in length, including the tail, which is 5 feet.

Skeleton of Megatherium.

2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

megatherm (meg′a-thêrm), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + θέρμη, heat.] In bot., a term proposed by Alphonse de Candolle in 1874 to designate a plant of his first "physiological group," requiring great heat combined with much moisture. The plants of this group (megatherms) occur either within the tropics or not beyond the thirtieth degree of latitude, in warm moist valleys where the mean temperature does not fall below 20° C. See hekistotherm.

megatype (meg′a-tīp), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, large, + τύπος, impression.] In photog., an enlarged positive.

megaulic (me-gâ′lik), a. [< NL. megaulicus, < Gr. μέγας, great, + NL. aula, aula: see aula, 2.] Having the aula large; specifically, of or pertaining to the Megaulica.

Megaulica (me-gâ′li-kä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of megaulicus: see megaulic.] Animals whose aula is large and whose cerebral hemispheres are extended horizontally or undifferentiated. They are the Ichthyopsida exclusive of amphibians, dipnoans, and Branchiostoma. Wilder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

megavolt (meg′a-vōlt), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see meg-), + E. volt.] A unit equal to one million volts.

megaweber (meg′a-vā-bèr), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see meg-), + E. weber.] A unit equal to a million webers.

megazoöspore (meg-a-zō′ō-spōr), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great, + ζῷον, animal, + σπόρος, seed.] Same as macrozoöspore.

megerg (meg′èrg), n. Same as megaerg.

Megilla (mē-jil′ä), n. [NL.] 1. A genus of ladybirds, of the family Coccinellidæ, founded by Mulsant in 1851. The larva of M. maculata, the spotted ladybird, is useful in devouring plant-lice, chinch-bugs, and eggs of the Colorado potato-beetle; the adult beetle feeds upon pollen. See cut under ladybird.

2. A genus of hymenopterous insects. Fabricius, 1804.

megilp (mē-gilp′), n. and v. See magilp.

Megistanes (mej-is-tā′nēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μεγιστᾶνες, great men, grandees, < μέγιστος, superl. of μέγας, great, large.] A superfamily group, by Newton made an order, of extant ratite birds, containing the two families Casuariidæ and Dromæidæ, or the cassowaries and emus. Called Casuarii by some authors.

megohm (meg′ōm), n. [< Gr. μέγας, great (see meg-), + ohm.] A unit equal to one million ohms.

megrim (mē′grim), n. [Early mod. E. also meagrim, meagrom; < ME. migrim, migreyme, migrene, mygreyn, a corruption of migraine, migraine, < OF. migraine, F. migraine (> G. Dan. migräne = Sw. migrän) = Sp. migraña = It. magrana, emigrania, < L. hemicranium, < Gr. ἡμικρανία, a pain in one side of the head, < ἡμι-, half, + κρανίον, head, cranium: see hemicrania.] 1. A form of headache usually confined to or beginning or predominating on one side of the head. It may be ushered in by malaise, languor, chilliness, or ocular or other sensory symptoms. The ocular symptoms are such as amblyopia, a glimmering appearance before the eyes, spectra of angular outline (fortification spectra), or hemianopsia. The headache, often becoming overpowering in its character and intensity, lasts from several hours to two or three days. At its height it is attended often with nausea and vomiting. The attacks return with a certain periodicity. Exhausting influences are apt to increase their frequency. The liability to megrim lasts for years, and is apt to disappear in middle life or later. Also called migraine, hemicrania, nervous headache, and sick-headache.

A fervent mygreyn was in the ryȝt syde of hurr hedde.
Chron. Vilodun., p. 12. (Halliwell.)

2. pl. Lowness of spirits, as from headache or general physical disturbance; the "blues"; a morbid or whimsical state of feeling.

These are his megrims, firks, and melancholies. Ford.

3. pl. In farriery, a sudden attack of sickness in a horse at work, when he reels, and either stands still for a minute dull and stupid, or falls to the ground insensible. These attacks are often periodical, but are most frequent in warm weather.

Meibomian (mī-bō′mi-an), a. [< Meibomius (see def.) + -an.] In anat., pertaining to Meibomius (Heinrich Meibom, a German physician, 1638–1700): specifically applied to the sebaceous follicles of the eyelids, known as Meibomian glands or follicles. They secrete the unctuous substance which lubricates the eye. See gland.

meidan, n. Same as maidan.

Meidinger cell (mī′ding-èr sel). A voltaic element in which the plates are zinc and copper and the liquids solutions of magnesium sulphate and copper sulphate. The copper plate and solution of copper sulphate are contained in a small jar which stands in the bottom of the cell; the supply of copper sulphate is kept up by means of a funnel or tube containing crystals of it and extending from the top of the cell down into the inner jar.

meikle, a. and n. See mickle.

meiniet, n. See meiny.

meint†. Past participle of ming[1].

meiny† (mē′ni), n. [Early mod. E. also meyney, meany, meny, menie, many, maignie, Sc. menyie, menzie, etc.; < ME. meiny, meine, meyny, mayny, meynee, mayne, meyne, menze, meigne, etc., < OF. mesnee, maisnee, mesnie, maignee, maineda = Pr. Sp. Pg. mesnada, manada = It. masnada (ML. reflex maisnada, mainada, mesnada, masnada, etc.), < mansionata*, a household, < L. mansio(n-), a dwelling, mansion: see mansion.] 1. Household; suite; attendants; retinue; train.

He wile senden after the Fram heuene adun of his meigne.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 47.

He sawe the deuill syttyng and all his meyny aboute hym. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 168.

Som man wolde out of his prisoun fayn,
That in his hous is of his meynee slayn.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 400.

2. Company; army.

Lest that she wolde hem with her hondes slen,
Or with her meynee putten hem to flyghte.
Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 352.

But the kynge Brandon and the kynge Pyncenars dide grete merveiles bothe with theire bodyes and theire meyne that were full bolde and hardy. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 588.

They summon'd up their meiny; straight took horse, Commanded me to follow and attend.
Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 35.

meio-. For words beginning thus, see mio-.

meipsead (mē-ip′sē-ad), n. [< L. me (= E. me), acc. of ego, I, + ipse, self, + -ad[1].] An egotistical writing. [Rare.]

My letters to you are such pure meipseads.
Southey, Letters, III. 57.

meirret, meiret, a. [Of obscure origin: cf. F. moire, moiré, watered silk, also OF. meire, "sorte de vêtement" (Godefr.). N. E. D.] In her., divided like the fur potent counter-potent.

Meissner's corpuscles, plexus. See corpuscle, plexus.

meistersänger, meistersinger (mīs′tèr-seng″-èr, -sing″èr), n. [G., < meister, master, + sänger (= AS. sangere), singer (< sang, song), or singer

= E. singer.] A mastersinger; specifically, a member of one of the societies or gilds formed during a period ranging from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century in the principal cities of Germany (the most celebrated at Nuremberg) for the cultivation of poetry and music. These societies were composed mostly of workingmen, and succeeded to the field occupied before their time by the Minnesänger, who had usually belonged to the aristocratic classes. They founded schools in which their art, called Meistergesang, was taught according to strict rules constituting a system called tabulatur. They practised chiefly lyrical poetry, generally on a biblical subject, sung with an accompaniment of some stringed instrument, as the harp, violin, etc. Before admission to the degree of Meister (master) it was necessary, as a rule, to pass through four preparatory degrees: viz., Schüler (scholar), Schulfreund (schoolfellow), Dichter (poet), and Sänger (singer). The candidate for admission to the gild had to present a poem and its musical accompaniment, which must receive the approval of four judges, called Merker, who examined the diction, grammatical construction, meter, rime, and melody. The Meistersänger claimed to trace their origin back to the middle of the tenth century, but their earliest school is alleged to have been founded at Mainz about 1312 by Frauenlob, one of the last of the Minnesingers, and schools were established afterward in all the principal cities of Germany. After the Reformation the gilds gradually became extinct, but the school at Ulm continued in existence until 1839.

meitht, n. See meeth[1].

meiurus, n. See miurus.

meizoseismal (mī-zō-sīs′mal), a. and n. [Irreg. < Gr. μείζων, irreg. comp. of μέγας, great, + σεισμός, an earthquake: see seismic.] I. a. Connected with or relating to the greatest overturning power of an earthquake-shock. Mallet. —Meizoseismal curve, that curve which connects points upon the earth's surface in which the upsetting or overturning power of an earthquake-shock was a maximum.

Within the meizoseismal curve the shock has less overturning power, because then its direction is more vertical; without, because, though more horizontal, the power of the shock has become weakened by distance of transmission. Mallet, in Admiralty Manual of Scientific Enquiry [(3d ed.), p. 351.

II. n. In seismological nomenclature, a curve uniting points of maximum disturbance or "overthrow" (Mallet), or those at which the effects of any earthquake-shock have been felt with the greatest violence.

meizoseismic (mī-zō-sīs′mik), a. [As meizoseism-al + -ic.] Same as meizoseismal.

me judice (mē jō′di-sē). [L.: me, abl. of ego, I; judice, abl. of judex, judge: see judge, n.] I being the judge; in my opinion; according to my judgment.

meket, a. and v. A Middle English form of meek.

Mekhitarist (mek′i-tär-ist), n. [Named after Mekhitar da Pietro, a native of Sebaste, Armenia, who founded a religious society at Constantinople: see def.] A member of an order of Armenian monks in communion with the Church of Rome, under a rule resembling the Benedictine, founded by Peter Mekhitar (1676–1749) at Constantinople in 1701, confirmed by the Pope in 1712, and finally settled on the island of San Lazzaro near Venice in 1717. This is still their chief seat, while they have an independent monastery at Vienna and branches in Russia, France, Italy, Turkey, etc. The Mekhitarists are devoted to the religious and literary interests of the Armenian race wherever found, and have published many ancient Armenian manuscripts as well as original works; and their society is also organized as a literary academy, which confers honorary membership without regard to race or religion. Also Mechitarist.

mekill, a. An old form of mickle.

melaconite (me-lak′ō-nīt), n. [< Gr. μέλας, black, + κόνις, dust, + -ite[2].] A black or grayish-black, impure, earthy (also crystallized) oxid of copper, found in Vesuvian lava (there called tenorite) and abundantly at Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior. In the latter case it is the result of the decomposition of other ores.

melada (me-lä′dä), n. [< Sp. melada, prop. fem. pp. of melar, candy, < miel, < L. mel, honey: see mell[2].] Crude or impure sugar as it comes from the pans, consisting of sugar and molasses together.

Melada shall be known and defined as an article made in the process of sugar-making, being the cane-juice boiled down to the sugar-point and containing all the sugar and molasses resulting from the boiling-process, and without any process of purging or clarification.
U. S. Statutes, XVIII. 339, quoted in Morgan's U. S. Tariff.

★melæna (me-lē′nä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλαινα (sc. χολή), black bile, fem. of μέλας, black.] 1. Black vomit: a term adopted by Sauvages to denote the occurrence of dark-colored, grumous, and pitchy evacuations, generally accompanied by vomiting of black-colored bloody matter. The black vomit in yellow fever is a morbid secretion mixed with blood from the lining membrane of the stomach and small intestines.

2. The discharge from the anus of dark, tarry, and altered blood, the result of intestinal hemorrhage.

Melænornis (mel-ē-nôr′nis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλαινα, fem. of μέλας, black, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of African drongo-shrikes established by G. R. Gray in 1840, containing such species as M. edolioides. Also called Melasoma.

melah (mē′lä), n. [E. Ind.] In the East Indies, a fair, or an assembly of pilgrims or devotees, partly for religious and partly for commercial purposes. Imp. Dict.

melainotype (me-lā′nō-tīp), n. An incorrect form for melanotype.

Melaleuca (mel-a-lū′kä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), so called in allusion to the black trunk and white branches; < Gr. μέλας, black, + λευκός, white.] A genus of plants of the family Myrtaceæ, the tribe Leptospermeæ, and the subtribe Euleptospermeæ. It is characterized by stamens united in bundles, and longer than the petals on which they are inserted (the bundles, however, not uniting to form a tube), and by numerous linear or wedge-shaped ovules arranged in the cells in an indefinite number of series. The plants are shrubs or trees, usually with alternate coriaceous leaves that are one-, three-, or several-nerved. The flowers are white, red, or yellow, generally in heads or spikes. See hillock-tree, tea-tree, and cajeput.

Melambo bark. Same as Malambo bark (which see, under bark[2]).

Melameridæ (mel-a-mer′i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Walker, 1855), < Gr. μέλας, black, + μηρός, thigh, + -idæ.] A family of bombycid moths, said by its founder to have much affinity to the Zygænidæ and also to the Pyralidæ, based upon no generic name. The wings are generally black, sometimes with a metallic hue, often adorned with bright colors, or partly limpid. There are about 12 genera, mainly confined to tropical America.

Melanconieæ (mel‖an-kō-nī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Corda, 1842), < Melanconium + -eæ.] One of the principal divisions of Fungi Imperfecti, or fungi of which the complete life-history is unknown. Many are suspected of being asexual stages of Ascomycetes. The spores ooze out in tendrils, or form a dark mass. Properly Melanconiaceæ.

Melanconium (mel-an-kō′ni-um), n. [NL. (Link, 1766), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + κῶνος, a cone.] A genus of fungi, typical of the family Melanconiaceæ, in which the spores are simple, globular-oblong, brownish, oozing out in a dark mass. About 100 widely distributed species, mostly saprophytic, are known.

Melandrya (me-lan′dri-ą), n. [NL., so called as found chiefly under the bark of trees; < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + δρῦς, tree, oak: see dryad.] The typical genus of Melandryidæ, founded by Fabricius in 1801. It is represented in northern Europe and North America. M. caraboides is a British species. M. stricta of Say is the only one known in the United States.

Melandryidæ (mel-an-drī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melandrya + -idæ.] A family of tracheliate heteromerous beetles, typified by the genus Melandrya. The anterior coxal cavities are open behind; the head is not strongly and suddenly constricted at base; the middle coxæ are not very prominent; the antennæ are free; the thorax is margined at the sides; and the disk has basal impressions. They inhabit temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

melanemia, n. See melanæmia.

Melanerpes (mel-ą-nėr′pēz), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + ἕρπειν, creep: see reptile.] A genus of woodpeckers of the family Picidæ, giving name to a subfamily Melanerpinæ. M. erythrocephalus, a typical example, is the common red-headed woodpecker of the United States, steel-blue-black and white with crimson head, one of the most abundant, showy, and familiar of its tribe in most of the States. M. formicivorus is a related species of the southwestern parts of the United States, noted for its habit of storing acorns in holes which it drills in dead timber. Many others have been referred to this genus.

Red-headed Woodpecker (Melanerpes erythrocephalus).

Melanerpinæ (mel‖ą-nėr-pī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Melanerpes + -inæ.] A subfamily of Picidæ, exemplified by the genus Melanerpes, of uncertain limits. The group includes many American woodpeckers, generally of spotted, striped, or otherwise variegated coloration, such as the species of Melanerpes and Centurus.

Melanesian (mel-ą-nē′shan), a. and n. [< Melanesia (see def.), lit. 'the islands of the blacks,' < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + νῆσος, an island.] I. a. Of or belonging to Melanesia or a race inhabiting it.

II. n. A native of Melanesia, a collection of islands in the western part of the Pacific, including New Caledonia, the Fiji Islands, Solomon Islands, New Hebrides, New Britain, etc. (some geographers include Papua and extend the term to comprise some of the lesser islands of the Malay archipelago); a member of one of the black or dark-brown races inhabiting the Melanesian islands. In race and language the Melanesians appear to have affinities with both the Papuans and the Polynesians.

Melanetta (mel-ą-net′ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας, black, + νῆττα, νῆσσα, duck: see Anas.] A genus of marine ducks of the family Anatidæ and subfamily Fuligulinæ; the white-winged black scoters, surf-ducks, or sea-coots. The males are black or blackish, with a large white area on the wing and a bright party-colored bill. The common North American species is M. velvetina or M. deglandi, very closely related to M. fusca of Europe and Asia, if really distinct. Also written Melanitta, and more correctly Melanonetta.

mélange (mā-lońzh′), n. [F., a mixture, < mêler, mix: see mell[1], meddle.] 1. A mixture; a medley; usually, an uncombined mingling or association of elements, objects, or individuals; in lit., a miscellany.—2. A French dress-goods of cotton chain and woolen weft. E. H. Knight.

Melania (me-lā′ni-ą), n. [NL., < L. melania, < Gr. μελανία, blackness, < μέλας (μελαν-), black.] 1. In conch., the typical genus of fresh-water snails of the family Melaniidæ and subfamily Melaniinæ, having a shell covered with thick and usually dark or blackish epidermis. The extent of the genus has varied much with different writers. There are about 400 species, mostly Asiatic and Polynesian.
2. In entom.: (a) A genus of dipterous insects. (b) A genus of lepidopterous insects.

Melaniacea (me-lā-ni-ā′sē-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Melania + -acea.] Same as Melaniidæ.

melaniacean (me-lā-ni-ā′sē-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Melaniacea.

melanian (me-lā′ni-an), a. and n. [< Melania + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Melaniidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the family Melaniidæ.

melanic (me-lan′ik), a. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -ic.] 1. Black; dark: as, a melanic race.—2. Of or pertaining to melanosis.—Melanic cancer, melanocarcinoma or melanosarcoma.—Melanic deposit, a deposit of dark pigment in the tissues.—Melanic variety or race, in zoöl., a variety or race characterized by a darker color or a greater extension of the dark markings than in others of the species. Such varieties have frequently been described as distinct species.

Melaniidæ (mel-ą-nī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melania + -idæ.] A family of gastropods of the order Prosobranchiata, typified by the genus Melania. The shell is spiral, turreted, and covered with dark epidermis; the aperture is often channeled or notched in front; the outer lip is acute; and the operculum is horny and spiral. The very numerous species, referable to many genera, are mostly fluviatile and ovoviviparous. They are found in nearly all the warmer parts of the world. The family is divided, both on structural characters and on geographical distribution, into two subfamilies, Melaniinæ and Strepomatinæ. Also Melaniacea, Melaniadæ, Melanidæ.

melaniiform (me-lā′ni-i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Melania + L. forma, form.] Having the form of the melanians; resembling a melanian.

Melaniinæ (me-lā-ni-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Melania + -inæ.] One of two subfamilies of Melaniidæ, typified by the genus Melania, containing chiefly Asiatic and Polynesian species, only a few of which are found in America: distinguished from Strepomatinæ. The aperture is usually rounded in front and not produced, though often notched; the mantle-margin is fringed. The species are ovoviviparous.

melaniine (me-lā′ni-in), a. and n. I. a. Melanian in a strict sense; of or pertaining to the Melaniinæ.

II. n. A member of the Melaniinæ.

melaniline (me-lan′i-lin), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + E. aniline.] A basic substance ($C_{13}H_{13}N_3$) obtained from cyanogen chlorid and dry aniline.

melanin (mel′a-nin), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -in[2].] The black pigment of the hair, choroid, retina, and epidermis of colored races; also, the dark pigment seen in melanæmia and in melanosarcoma and melanocarcinoma. The pigments in these cases may, however, be different.

We must be on our guard, however, not to confound the ordinary black pigment found in the human lungs with melanin. Frey, Histol. and Histochem. (trans.), p. 53.

melanioid (me-lā′ni-oid), a. and n. [< Melania + -oid.] Same as melanian.

Melanippe (mel-a-nip′ē), n. [NL. (Duponchel, 1829), < Gr. Μελανίππη, f., Μελάνιππος, m., a mythical proper name, < μέλας (μελαν-), black, + ἵππος, horse.] A genus of geometrid moths of the subfamily Larentinæ, of wide distribution, with over 40 species.

melanism (mel′a-nizm), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -ism.] In physiol., an undue development of coloring material in the skin and its appendages: the opposite of albinism; specifically, in zoöl., the abnormal development of black or dark pigment in the pelage of a mammal or the plumage of a bird. It is not pathological, like melanosis, interfering in no way with the health and vigor of the animal; it is very frequent in some groups, as squirrels and hawks, and sometimes becomes an inherited specific character, as in the case of the black rats, Mus rattus and Mus atridorsum, and in certain Malayan squirrels, Sciurus erebus, S. melanogaster, S. atratus, etc.

melanistic (mel-a-nis′tik), a. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -ist-ic.] Affected with melanism; abnormally dark in color. Also melanotic.

The Nasua vittata was based on a melanistic specimen of N. rufa, collected by the traveler Schomburgk. J. A. Allen.

melanite (mel′a-nīt), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -ite[2].] 1. A variety of garnet of a deep-black color. It properly belongs to the lime-iron division of the species, but some other kinds are also included. It is often associated with volcanic rocks, as at Vesuvius. Some varieties are remarkable as containing a small percentage of titanium, and seem to be intermediate between garnet and schorlomite. See garnet[1].

2. In conch., a fossil melanian.

melanitic (mel-a-nit′ik), a. [< melanite + -ic.] Pertaining to, resembling, or containing melanite.

melanocarcinoma (mel″a-nō-kär-si-nō′mä), n.; pl. melanocarcinomata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + καρκίνωμα, cancer: see carcinoma.] In pathol., a pigmented carcinoma, from gray to brown and black in color. The pigment lies partly in the epithelial tracts, and partly in the stroma. It is less frequent than melanotic sarcomata.

Melanocetinæ (mel″a-nō-se-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Melanocetus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Ceratiidæ, represented by the genus Melanocetus.

melanocetine (mel″a-nō-sē′tin), a. and n. I. a. Having the characters of or pertaining to the Melanocetinæ.

II. n. A pediculate fish of the subfamily Melanocetinæ.

Melanocetus (mel″a-nō-sē′tus), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + κῆτος, a whale: see Cetacea.] A genus of deep-sea pediculate fishes, Melanocetus johnsoni (the belly distended with another fish), about half natural size.

typical of the subfamily Melanocetinæ, black in color, and with a mouth suggesting that of a whale. M. johnsoni is the only species. Günther, 1864.

Melanochroi (mel-a-nok′rō-ī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of melanochroïs, black-skinned: see melanochrous.] In anthropology, the dark-white peoples, a variety or class of mankind according to Huxley's classification. They are pale-complexioned people, with dark hair and eyes, and generally long but sometimes broad skulls, as the Iberians and black Celts of western Europe, and the dark-complexioned white people of the shores of the Mediterranean, western Asia, and Persia.

I am disposed to think that the Melanochroi are not a distinct group, but result from the mixture of Australioids and Xanthochroi. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 421.

Hamitic and Semitic Melanochroi. W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 317.

melanochroic (mel″a-nō-krō′ik), a. [< melanochrous + -ic.] Dark-colored; of or pertaining to the Melanochroi: as, the melanochroic races.

The melanochroic or dark stock of Europe. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 180.

melanochroite (mel″a-nō-krō′īt), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + χροιά, χρόα, color, + -ite[2].] A basic chromate of lead found at Berezovsk in the Ural. Also called phœnicochroite, since the color is red rather than black.

melanochroous (mel-a-nok′rō-us), a. [< NL. melanochroïs, < Gr. μελανόχροος (also μελάγχροος), black-skinned, < μέλας (μελαν-), black, + χροιά, χρόα, skin, color.] Dark-colored; belonging to the Melanochroi, the brunette race of Europe, North Africa, and western Asia.

There seems good ground for the belief that, . . . among Europeans, the melanochrous people are less obnoxious to its [yellow fever's] ravages than the xanthochrous. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 157.

melanocomous (mel-a-nok′ō-mus), a. [< Gr. μελανοκόμης, black-haired, < μέλας (μελαν-), black, + κόμη, hair: see coma[2].] Black-haired; having black hair.

Melanocorypha (mel″a-nō-kor′i-fä), n. [NL. (Boie, 1828), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + κορυφή, head, top: see coryphæus.] One of the leading genera of the lark family, Alaudidæ, containing such as the common M. calandra, the calandra lark of Europe and Africa, and M. sibirica, the white-winged lark.

Melanodendron (mel″a-nō-den′dron), n. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1836), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + δένδρον, a tree.] A genus of plants of the family Asteraceæ, tribe Astereæ, and subtribe Asterinæ. They have copious bristly pappus; numerous narrow bracts of the involucre, which are arranged in an indefinite number of series; and achenia which are 3- or 5-ribbed, and scarcely compressed. There is but a single species, M. integrifolium. See black cabbage-tree, under cabbage-tree.

melanoid (mel′a-noid), a. [< Gr. μελανοειδής, black-looking, < μέλας (μελαν-), black, + εἶδος, form.] Having a black or dark appearance.—Melanoid cancer, in pathol., melanocarcinoma.

melanoma (mel-a-nō′mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μελάνωμα, blackness, < μελανοῦν*, blacken, < μέλας (μελαν-), black.] A dark-pigmented tumor.

melanopathia (mel-a-nō-path′i-ä), n. [NL.: see melanopathy.] An excess of the dark pigment of the skin, due to abnormal function of the rete mucosum. See melasma.

melanopathy (mel-a-nop′a-thi), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -παθεια, < πάθος, suffering.] Same as melanopathia.

Melanophila (mel-a-nof′i-lä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + φίλος, loving.] A genus of buprestid beetles founded by Eschscholtz. About 40 species are known, and the genus is proper to the cold and temperate regions of both hemispheres; but a few have been found in Brazil and the East Indies. Eleven occur in North America. M. fulvoguttata is a small brassy-black species with three pairs of yellow spots, inhabiting pines in the northern United States.

melanophlogite (mel-a-nof′lō-jīt), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + φλόξ (φλογ-), a flame (see phlox), + -ite[2].] A mineral occurring in colorless cubic crystals, which turn black when heated (hence the name). It consists of almost pure silica, and is probably a pseudomorph. It is found associated with the crystals of sulphur of Girgenti, Sicily.

Melanophyceæ (mel″a-nō-fī′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Rabenhorst, 1868), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + φῦκος, a seaweed, + -eæ.] One of the five great divisions of Algæ according to the classification of Rabenhorst. It included the Phæosporeæ and Fucaceæ, and is practically the same as Phæophyceæ or Fucoideæ.

Melanopsidæ (mel-a-nop′si-dē), n. pl. [< Melanopsis + -idæ.] An Old World family of gastropods, typified by the genus Melanopsis, related to and detached from Melaniidæ. The spire is short and pointed, the body-whorl lengthened, and the pillar-lip thickened.

Melanopsis (mel-a-nop′sis), n. [NL., < Melan(ia) + Gr. ὄψις, appearance.] 1. The typical genus of Melanopsidæ. M. costata is a Syrian species, said to be found in the Dead Sea.—2. [l. c.; pl. melanopsides (-si-dēz).] A member of this genus.

Melanorrhœa (mel″a-nō-rē′ä), n. [NL. (Wallich, 1829), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + ῥοία, a flowing, < ῥεῖν, flow.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Anacardiaceæ and the tribe Mangifereæ, characterized by simple leaves, by the petals growing after the flower expands, and by the numerous stamens. They are large trees, over a hundred feet in height, and have broad spreading heads bearing large entire coriaceous leaves, and axillary panicles of perfect flowers. The fruit is a drupe, and is surrounded by the five or six enlarged petals, which are spread out in a star-like manner. There are 6 species, natives of eastern India and the Malay archipelago. M. usitata is the black, Martaban, or Burmese varnish-tree.

melanosarcoma (mel″a-nō-sär-kō′mä), n.; pl. melanosarcomata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + σάρκωμα, sarcoma.] In pathol., a form of sarcoma characterized by the presence of dark pigment. It most frequently occurs in the skin and choroid coat of the eye, is usually formed of spindle-shaped cells, and is very malignant.

melanoscope (mel′a-nō-skōp), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument devised by Lommel to distinguish between the flames of substances which in the spectroscope exhibit red bands. It consists of a pair of spectacles made of glass of light-violet color over dark-red glass, a combination which admits only red rays, so that most greens, for example, would appear black.

melanose (mel′a-nōs), n. [NL., < Gr. μελάνωσις, a becoming black: see melanosis.] A fungous disease of grape-vines, caused by Septoria ampelina. The leaves are the parts attacked, and are at first covered with brownish spots; these soon spread over and discolor the entire surface of the leaf, which then drops off. The fungus is probably a native of Europe, but also occurs in New York, along the lakes, in Kansas, and in Missouri. See Septoria.

melanosiderite (mel″a-nō-sid′e-rīt), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + σιδερῖτης, of iron: see siderite.] A mineral occurring in black masses with a vitreous or resinous luster. It consists of hydrated iron sesquioxid with 7 per cent. of silica. It is found at Mineral Hill, Delaware county, Pennsylvania.

melanosis (mel-a-nō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μελάνωσις, a becoming black, < μελανοῦν*, blacken: see melanoma.] In pathol.: (a) An abnormal deposition of pigmentary matter in various organs or parts of the body, as the spleen, liver, or bone-marrow, associated with melanæmia, malarial poisoning, etc. (b) The condition of the system associated with the presence of pigmented tumors. Specifically, this is an organic affection (due to the softening of the tissue of the part from a pigmentary deposit, especially tubercles) in which tissue is converted into a black, hard, homogeneous substance, near which ulcers or cavities may form.

melanosity (mel-a-nos′i-ti), n. [< melanous (-ose) + -ity.] Tendency toward blackness; darkness of color, as of the hair or eyes. Beddoe, Science, VII. 84.

melanosperm (mel′a-nō-spėrm), n. An alga belonging to the division Melanospermeæ.

Melanospermeæ (mel″a-nō-spėr′mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Harvey, 1849), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + σπέρμα, seed, + -eæ.] The olive-brown seaweeds, one of the three principal divisions into which the Algæ were divided by Harvey. It included the Fucaceæ, Laminariaceæ, etc., but is now obsolete.

melanospermous (mel″a-nō-spėr′mus), a. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + σπέρμα, seed, + -ous.] Belonging to the Melanospermeæ, an obsolete name for the brown algæ.

The group of melanospermous or olive-green sea-weeds. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 327.

melanotekite (mel″a-nō-tē′kīt), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + τήκειν, melt, + -ite[2].] A rare silicate of lead and iron found in Sweden, also in New Mexico. It occurs in blackish-gray crystalline masses, also in crystals resembling those of kentrolite. It fuses easily to a black glass.

melanothallite (mel″a-nō-thal′īt), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + θάλλος, a branch, + -ite[2].] In mineral., a mineral occurring in black lamellæ, which upon exposure gradually change to a green color, and containing copper chlorid, copper oxid, and water. It was found as a sublimation-product at Vesuvius.

melanotic (mel-a-not′ik), a. [< melanosis (-ot-) + -ic.] 1. Properly, affected with melanosis; melanic; melanoid.—2. In zoöl., same as melanistic.—Melanotic cancer, melanocarcinoma or melanosarcoma.

Melanotus (mel-a-nō′tus), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + νῶτος, the back.] A genus of click-beetles of the family Elateridæ, founded by Eschscholtz in 1829. It is one of the largest and most important genera of Elateridæ, and is distributed all over the world. There are upward of 100 species, 44 of which are North American. These beetles give rise to some of the most destructive wire-worms. M. communis is a common brown pilose species of the United States, half an inch long.

melanotype (mel'a-nō-tīp), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + τύπος, type.] In photog., a ferrotype. [Rare or obsolete.]

melanous (mel'a-nus), a. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + -ous.] Dark-complexioned; brunette: the opposite of blond or xanthous. Pritchard.

The melanous, with black hair and dark brown or blackish skins. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 153.

Melanoxylon (mel-a-nok'si-lon), n. [NL. (Schott, 1827), < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of leguminous plants of the family Cæsalpiniaceæ and the tribe Sclerolobieæ, characterized by a compressed partially woody legume with samara-like seeds, the outer integument expanding into a wing at the apex. There is but one species, M. Brauna. See brauna, 1.

melanterite (me-lan'tē-rīt), n. [< Gr. μελαντηρία, a black metallic dye, + *-ite*2.] The native hydrous sulphate of iron.

Melanthium (me-lan'thi-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), so called in allusion to the darker color which the persistent perianth assumes after blossoming; < Gr. μέλας, black, + ἄνθος, a flower.] A genus of plants, type of the family Melanthiaceæ. They have flat broadly winged seeds, and the segments of the perianth have a distinct claw. They are herbs having an erect leafy stem springing from a short rootstock, and an open pyramidal panicle of polygamous flowers, which are yellowish-white or greenish. There are 4 species, all natives of North America, and sometimes cultivated for ornament. M. Virginicum of the United States is called bunch-flower (which see).

melanuria (mel-a-nū'ri-ä), n. [NL.: see melanurin.] The presence of a dark pigment in the urine.

melanuric (mel-a-nū'rik), a. [As melanurin + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by the presence of very dark pigment in the urine.—Melanuric fever. See *fever*1.

melanurin (mel-a-nū'rin), n. [< Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + οὖρον, urine.] A dark pigment found in the urine.

melaphyre (mel'a-fīr), n. [< Gr. μέλας, black, + (πορ)φυρ(ίτης), porphyry: see porphyry.] In petrog., a name originating with Al. Brongniart (1813), who applied it to dark igneous rocks of porphyritic texture characterized by distinct feldspar crystals embedded in a dense aphanitic ground-mass, supposed to be rich in hornblende. As knowledge of dark porphyries increased, showing that rocks of very different composition possessed this habit, the application of the term became diverse. Usage has become unified in applying the term 'melaphyre' to pre-tertiary feldspar basalts. It is used less now than formerly. See basalt.

mela-rosa, mella-rosa (mel″a-rō'zä), n. [< It. mela, an apple, + rosa, a rose.] The fruit of a tree of the genus Citrus, probably a variety of the lime, cultivated in Italy.

melasma (me-las'mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλασμα, a black color, < μελαίνειν, blacken, < μέλας, black: see melas.] 1. An abnormal access of color of the skin, local or general, usually dependent upon constitutional disorder; local pigmentary stains of the skin. The morbid process is called melanopathia. Addison's disease is known as suprarenal melasma.—2. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) A genus of melanian mollusks. Adams, 1858. (b) A genus of tenebrionine beetles, based on M. lineatum of the Canaries. Wollaston, 1864.

melasmic (me-las'mik), a. and n. [< melasma + -ic.] I. a. Pertaining to melasma: as, melasmic blotches.

II. n. Same as melasma, 1.

melassest, n. An obsolete form of molasses.

melassic (me-las'ik), a. [< F. melasse, molasses, + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from molasses: as, melassic acid.

Melastoma (me-las'tō-mä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), so called because the fruit of some species, when eaten, stains the lips black; < Gr. μέλας (μελαν-), black, + στόμα, mouth.] An old world genus of plants, type of the family Melastomaceæ, belonging to the tribe Osbeckieæ. They have from 10 to 14 unequal anthers, the connectives of the longer ones being produced anteriorly into two tubercles or spurs. They are hairy shrubs, almost always erect, with coriaceous entire leaves which are from 3- to 7-nerved, and showy purple or rose-colored flowers growing at the tips of the branches, either solitary or in clusters. About 40 species are known, natives of tropical and eastern Asia, northern Australia, Oceania, and the Seychelles. M. Malabathricum, a shrub common in India, is there known as Indian rhododendron. It is also called Malabar laurel or gooseberry.

Melastomaceæ (me-las-tō-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Brown, 1818), < Melastoma + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Myrtales. The ovules are attached to the interior angle of the cells, or to basal placentæ; the anther usually opens at the top by two pores; the connective is thickened or variously appendaged; and the leaves have from 3 to 9 nerves. The family embraces 164 genera, divided into 13 tribes. These plants are almost entirely confined to the tropics.

melastomaceous (me-las-tō-mā'shius), a. Belonging to the family of plants Melastomaceæ.

Melastomeæ (mel-a-stō'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Seringe, 1828), < Melastoma + -eæ.] A subfamily of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Melastomaceæ. The cells have rather prominent placentæ inserted in their internal angles, and many ovules; the embryo is very small, and slightly rounded or subglobose. In de Candolle's system it embraced 3 tribes and 64 genera; in that of Bentham and Hooker 9 tribes and 128 genera, of which Melastoma is the type; in that of Engler the corresponding group is still further enlarged.

Melchite (mel'kīt), n. and a. [< MGr. Μελχίτης, < Syriac malkāyē, Ar. malekīya, milkīya, lit. royal, < melek, king.] I. n. An orthodox Eastern Christian as distinguished from a Monophysite or Nestorian. The name was originally given to the Orthodox as belonging to the imperial church, the title of king being that which was commonly given in Greek and in Oriental languages to the Roman and to the Byzantine emperor. Although the term Melchite is older than the Council of Chalcedon (A. D. 451), its wider use dates from its adoption after that council by the Monophysites, who rejected the decrees of the council, and employed this name to represent the Orthodox as receiving them merely in submission to the edict of the emperor Marcian. The name Melchite is sometimes given also to members of communities of Christians in Syria and Egypt, formerly in communion with the Orthodox Greek Church, who have submitted to the Roman see.

Those Syrian Christians who, though not Greeks, followed the doctrines of the Greek Church as declared at the Council of Chalcedon, were called by their opponents, by way of reproach, Melchites, 'royalists' or 'imperialists,' because they submitted to the edict of Marcian in favour of the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon.

Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 291.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Melchites: as, the uncial Melchite alphabet. Isaac Taylor.

melder (mel'dėr), n. [< Icel. meldr, flour or corn in the mill, < mala, grind: see *meal*1.] The quantity of meal sent to a mill to be ground at one time. [Scotch.]

That ilka melder wi' the miller
Thou sat as lang as thou had siller.

Burns, Tam o' Shanter.

meldometer (mel-dom'e-tėr), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μέλδειν, melt, + μέτρον, measure.] An apparatus devised by Joly for determining the melting-points of minerals. It involves the use of a platinum strip heated to the required degree by the passage of an electrical current, whose temperature is calculated by the ordinary methods.

mele1†, n. A Middle English form of *meal*1.

mele2†, n. A Middle English form of *meal*2.

mele3†, n. [< AS. māl (= Icel. mál = Dan. mæle), speech, talk, conversation.] Discourse; conversation.

O moul thou marrez a myry mele.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 23.

mele3†, v. [ME. melen, < AS. mālan (= Icel. mæla = Dan. mæle), speak, < māl, speech, talk: see *mele*3, n.] I. intrans. 1. To speak; talk.

And whon that Wit was i-war hou his wyf tolde,
He bi-com so confoundet he couthe not mele,
And as doumbe as a dore drouȝ him asyde.

Piers Plowman (A), xi. 93.

2. To chatter; twitter, as birds.

Bothe the thrusch & the thrustele bi xxxti of bothe,
Meleden ful merye in maner of here kinde.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 821.

II. trans. To call or bring together; assemble.

Themperour with moche merthe his men than meled.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1287.

mele4†, n. [A form of *male*4; < L. malum, an apple.] An apple. See *male*4.

The meles round, ycald orbicular, withouten care a yer may keped be.

Palladius, Husbandry, III. 891.

Meleagridæ, Meleagrididæ (mel-ē-ag'ri-dē, mel″ē-ag-rid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Meleagris (-id-) + -idæ.] A family of Gallinæ or gallinaceous birds; the turkeys. The name is sometimes restricted to the American turkeys, and sometimes includes the African guinea-fowls.

Meleagridinæ, Meleagrinæ (mel-ē-ag-ri-dī'nē, mel″ē-ag-rī'nē), n. pl. Turkeys as an American subfamily of Phasianidæ, typified by the genus Meleagris.

Meleagrina (mel″ē-ag-rī'nä), n. [NL., < Meleagris, 2, + *-ina*2.] A genus of asiphonate bivalves of the family Aviculidæ or Pteriidæ, the wing-shells, having the wings reduced and no cardinal teeth; the true pearl-oysters. The pearl-oyster is M. margaritifera, a species widely distributed in most parts of the world, in warm seas; it sometimes attains a length of 10 or 12 inches.

Meleagrina (Avicula) margaritifera.
b, byssal foramen or notch; g, suspensors of the gills.

Meleagris (mel-ē-ā'gris), n. [NL., < L. meleagris, < Gr. μελεαγρίς, a sort of guinea-fowl, named after Meleager, < Μελέαγρος, > L. Meleager, son of Œneus, and the hero of the hunt of the Calydonian boar.] 1. In ornith.: (a) [l. c.] A name of the common guinea-fowl, to which Linnæus gave the technical specific name Numida meleagris. (b) An American genus of Phasianidæ or Meleagridæ, of large size with varied metallic plumage, naked tarsi spurred in the male, bare head with erectile fleshy caruncles, and a tuft of hair-like feathers on the breast; the turkeys. There are four kinds: M. gallopavo of the eastern United States, and three geographical races, or subspecies, one of which, M. gallopavo mexicana, found in Mexico, is the original stock of the domesticated bird. See turkey.

2. In conch., a genus of mollusks; same as Meleagrina. Montfort, 1810.

mêlée (mā-lā'), n. [F., < OF. meslee, medlee, etc., a mixture, confusion, fight, > E. medley and melley, q. v.] A confused conflict, as a hand-to-hand fight among a number of persons; especially, in modern books, a tourney in which many combatants (not two only) take part.

"I shall tilt to-morrow," answered Athelstane, "in the melée; it is not worth while for me to arm myself to-day."

Scott, Ivanhoe, iii.

=Syn. Affray, Brawl, etc. See *quarrel*1, n.

melegueta pepper. Same as grains of paradise (which see, under *grain*1).

Meles (mē'lēz), n. [NL., < L. meles, also mæles, melis, mælis, a badger or marten.] The typical genus of the subfamily Melinæ, family Mustelidæ. It formerly included all the Melinæ, but is now restricted to the European badger, M. vulgaris or M. taxus. See Melinæ, and cut under *badger*2.

Meletian (me-lē'shan), n. [< Gr. Μελητιανοί, pl., < Μελήτιος, LL. Melētius: see def.] 1. One of a sect of the fourth and fifth centuries, followers of Meletius, schismatic bishop of Lycopolis in Egypt. After his death they adopted Arian views.—2. A follower of Meletius, made bishop of Antioch about A.D. 360. He was supposed to be an Arian, but proceeded immediately to profess the Nicene faith, and the Arians appointed another bishop in his stead. Among the Orthodox some were adherents of Meletius, and therefore known as Meletians; others remained separate, and were known (from the last canonically ordained bishop, Eustathius, then dead) as Eustathians. Further difficulty was occasioned by the two orthodox parties using the word hypostasis (which see) in different senses. The schism between them continued till the end of the century.

mele-tide†, n. See meal-tide.

Melia (mē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), so called from the resemblance of the leaves to those of the ash, < Gr. μελία, the ash.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Meliaceæ and the tribe Melieæ, characterized by pinnate leaves, an elongated stamen-tube, and from 10 to 12 anthers. They are trees, with alternate pinnate or bipinnate leaves, and large axillary panicles of medium-sized flowers, which are white or purple, and are either 5- or 6-parted. There are 12 species, found in eastern India, Australia, and Oceania. M. Azedarach, variously known as pride-of-India, bead-tree, false sycamore, etc., is native in sub-Himalayan India, Persia, and China, and widely cultivated for ornament in warm countries. It is from 30 to 50 feet high, and has bipinnate leaves, and large clusters of fragrant lilac-colored blossoms, whence it is sometimes called Indian lilac. Its wood, hard and finely marked, is sometimes called bastard cedar. A decoction of its bark is cathartic and emetic, and sometimes used also as a vermifuge. (See azedarach, bead-tree, Flowering Branch of Melia Azedarach.

a, part of the inflorescence; b, a flower; c, a flower cut longitudinally; d, the fruits.

china-tree, and holy tree, under holy.) Also called hill-margosa. The tree long known as M. Azadirachta, but now classed as Azadirachta Azadirachta, is the margosa or nim-tree, common in India, often planted there and elsewhere. (See margosa.) M. dubia is an elegant tree of India, the Malayan archipelago, and Australia, called in the last-named country white cedar. M. Azedarach has been called hoop-tree in the West Indies. A form with depressed umbrella-like top is cultivated in the U. S.

Meliaceæ (mē-li-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Ventenat, 1799), ‹ Melia + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Geraniales. The calyx is small, the stamens are almost always monadelphous, and the anthers are sessile on the tube or (usually) stalked. The family includes 47 genera and about 756 species, found throughout the warmer but rare in the temperate regions of the globe.

meliaceous (mē-li-ā′shius), a. Belonging to or resembling the Meliaceæ. Also cedrelaceous.

Meliad (mē′li-ad), n. [‹ Gr. Μηλιάδες, nymphs of fruit-trees (or of flocks), ‹ μῆλον, an apple or any tree-fruit (or μῆλον, a sheep or goat).] In Gr. myth., a nymph of fruit-trees or of flocks.

> And from the grove
> The Meliads, who here for lack of flocks
> Must tend the fruit.
> R. H. Stoddard, The Search for Persephone.

Melianthaceæ (mel″i-an-thā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1850), ‹ Melianthus + -aceæ.] A small family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Sapindales, characterized by irregular polygamodiœcious flowers, stamens which are inserted at the base of the disk, albuminous seeds, and alternate stipulate leaves. Melianthus is the type genus.

Melianthus (mel-i-an′thus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), ‹ Gr. μέλι, honey, + ἄνθος, a flower.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, type of the family Melianthaceæ, characterized by a calyx which is very oblique at the base, and by having from two to four ovules in each cell. They are shrubs with alternate odd-pinnate leaves (the leaflets one-sided and decurrent on the stalk), and bear terminal or axillary racemes of curious irregular flowers, the lower ones sometimes imperfect. There are 5 species, natives of the Cape of Good Hope, one of which has been introduced into the Himalayas. The common name is (Cape) honey-flower, or honey-plant, the blossoms abounding in honey.

Melibean, Melibœan (mel-i-bē′an), a. [‹ L. Melibœus, name of a shepherd in Virgil's first eclogue (a dialogue), ‹ Gr. Μελίβοιος, cf. fem. Μελίβοια, a personal name.] In rhet. and poetry, alternate; alternately responsive; alternating; amœbean.

melic (mel′ik), a. [‹ Gr. μελικός, pertaining to song, ‹ μέλος, a song, strain, melody.] Pertaining to song; intended to be sung: applied especially to the more elaborate form of Greek lyric poetry, as distinguished from iambic and elegiac poetry.

> The exact relation of melic poetry to the cantonal dialect.
> Amer. Jour. Philol., VII. 234.

Melica (mel′i-kạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), ‹ It. melica, the great millet, ‹ L. mel, honey.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Festuceæ, type of the subtribe Meliceæ. The upper glumes are empty, and the spikelets are often quite large and erect or spreading. They are erect perennial plants, often tall, with usually slender panicles, and flat or convolute leaves. About 30 species are known, having a wide range over the globe, but mostly natives of temperate climates. They are handsome grasses, but of no great agricultural value, though some serve the purpose of pasturage. Melic-grass is a general name for the species.

Meliceæ (mē-lis′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1846), ‹ Melica + -eæ.] A subtribe of grasses of the tribe Festuceæ: type genus Melica. It includes 7 genera and about 42 species.

meliceris (mel-i-sē′ris), n. [NL., ‹ L. meliceris, ‹ Gr. μελικηρίς, a tumor so called, ‹ μελίκηρον, a honeycomb, ‹ μέλι, honey, + κηρός, wax.] In pathol., an encysted tumor containing matter like honey in color and consistence, usually a hygroma.

melicerous (mel-i-sē′rus), a. [‹ meliceris(is) + -ous.] Of the nature of meliceris; affected with meliceris: as, a melicerous tumor.

1. Flowering Plant of Melic-grass (Melica mutica). 2. The panicle. a, a spikelet; b, the empty glumes; c, a flowering glume, side view; d, the same, back view.

melic-grass (mel′ik-gras), n. Any grass of the genus Melica.

Melicocceæ (mel-i-kok′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Blume, 1847), ‹ Melicocca + -eæ.] A tribe of the family Sapindaceæ, the soapberry family. It embraces 7 genera, Melicoccus being the type, and 42 species, found principally in the tropics.

Melicoccus (mel-i-kok′us), n. [NL. (Jacquin, 1760), ‹ Gr. μέλι, honey, + κόκκος, a berry.] A genus of trees of the family Sapindaceæ, type of the tribe Melicocceæ. They are trees of considerable size, with alternate, abruptly pinnate leaves, and elongated, many-flowered racemes or panicles of small whitish flowers. See honeyberry.

melicotton†, n. Same as melocoton.

Melidæ (mel′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Meles + -idæ.] A family of arctoid carnivorous mammals, composed of the badgers, ratels, and skunks, corresponding to the three subfamilies Melinæ, Mellivorinæ, and Mephitinæ of the family Mustelidæ. See these words.

Melieæ (mē-lī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Adr. Jussieu, 1830), ‹ Melia + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Meliaceæ. The cells of the ovary contain two ovules, and the seeds have a fleshy albumen and plano-convex or foliaceous cotyledons. Melia is the type genus.

Melierax (me-lī′e-raks), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. μέλος, a song, + ἱέραξ, a hawk.] A genus of African diurnal birds of prey of the family Falconidæ, Chanting Hawk (Melierax musicus).

founded by G. R. Gray in 1840; the chanting hawks. There are several species, the best-known of which are M. canorus, cantans, or musicus of South Africa and M. polyzonus.

Melifera, meliferous. See Mellifera, melliferous.

Meligethes (mel-i-jē′thēz), n. [NL., ‹ Gr. μελιγηθής*, Doric μελιγαθής, honey-sweet, ‹ μέλι, honey, + γηθεῖν, rejoice.] A genus of pentamerous beetles of the family Nitidulidæ. There are over 100 species, mostly of Europe, where they are sometimes called glow-beetles; they feed on various flowers, eating the pollen and fructifying organs. In this way M. æneus injures cruciferous vegetables.

melilite, mellilite (mel′i-līt), n. [Prop. melilite, ‹ Gr. μέλι, honey, + λίθος, stone.] A mineral of a yellow or grayish yellow, found at Tivoli and Capo di Bove, near Rome. It occurs in very minute tetragonal crystals in the fissures and cavities of lava, also as an essential constituent of certain kinds of basalt; it is a silicate of aluminium, magnesium, and calcium.

★melilot (mel′i-lot), n. [‹ OF. melilot, mellilot, merilot, F. melilot = Sp. Pg. meliloto = It. meliloto, melliloto, ‹ L. melilotos, ‹ Gr. μελίλωτον or μελίλωτος, a kind of clover, ‹ μέλι, honey, + λωτός, lotus: see lotus.] A plant of the genus Melilotus.

Melilotus (mel-i-lō′tus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700): see melilot.] A genus of plants belonging to the Fabaceæ, or pulse family, and the tribe Trifolieæ; the clovers. It is distinguished by a small, fleshy, subglobous or obovoid legume, which is indehiscent or at length two-valved. The plants of the genus Melilotus are herbs, with pinnately trifoliate leaves which have adnate stipules, and small white or yellow flowers, growing in loose racemes. About 20 species are known, which are natives of the temperate and subtropical regions of the old world. When dried, they have the peculiar fragrance of the Tonka bean or the vernal grass, owing to the presence of the principle called coumarin (which see). General names for the genus are melilot and sweet clover. M. alba, the white melilot or honey-lotus, also called Cabul clover, is an excellent bee-plant, but of little value as forage, and in some places a troublesome weed. M. officinalis, the common or yellow melilot, is, like the last, widely spread over Europe and Asia, and naturalized in America. It was formerly of medicinal repute, sold by the herbalists as balsam-flowers, but has disappeared from scientific medicine. See hart's-clover and king's-clover.

Melinæ (mē-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., ‹ Meles + -inæ.] A subfamily of Mustelidæ, typified by the genus Meles; the badgers. The form is stout and squat; the habits are terrestrial and fossorial. There are four leading forms of Melinæ: the European Meles, the Asiatic Arctonyx and Mydaus, and the American Taxidea. Also Melina.

meline (mē′lin), a. and n. [‹ L. meles, a badger (see Meles), + -ine[1].] I. a. Badger-like; of or pertaining to the Melinæ.

II. n. A badger of any kind; any member of the Melinæ.

melingt, n. [Verbal n. of mele[3], v.] Talk; conversation.

> Will[i]am to the window witterli mi3t sene
> 3if Meliors with hire maydenes in meling there sete.
> William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 760.

melinite (mā′lin-īt), n. An explosive of French invention, consisting of picric acid, and guncotton dissolved in ether. It has been successfully used in charging shells, and its explosive force has been variously represented as from three to eleven times that of gunpowder, the smaller figure being the most probable.

melinophane (mel′i-nō-fān), n. [Prob. ‹ Gr. μήλινος, of a quince-yellow, + -φανής, appearing, ‹ φαίνεσθαι, appear.] In mineral., a silicate of beryllium, calcium, and sodium, occurring in honey-yellow or sulphur-yellow plates in the zircon-syenite of Norway. The name is changed in Dana's system, to meliphanite (meliphane).

meliorate (mē′lyo̤-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. meliorated, ppr. meliorating. [‹ LL. melioratus, pp. of meliorare (> It. megliorare, migliorare = Pg. melhorar = Sp. mejorar = OF. meliorer, meillorer), make better, ‹ melior, better (compar. of bonus, good), = Gr. μᾶλλον, adv., rather, compar. of μάλα, adv., very much.] I. trans. To make better; improve; ameliorate.

> Grace does not give us new faculties and create another nature, but meliorates and improves our own.
> Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 269.

> Tragedy . . . was found the most pleasing vehicle of conveying moral truths, of meliorating the heart, and extending the interests of humanity.
> Goldsmith, Origin of Poetry.

II. intrans. To grow better; be improved.

> Yesterday not a bird peeped; the world was barren, peaked and pining: to-day 'tis inconceivably populous; creation swarms and meliorates.
> Emerson, Works and Days.

meliorater (mē′lyo̤-rā-tėr), n. Same as meliorator.

melioration (mē-lyo̤-rā′shọn), n. [= OF. melioration, ‹ LL. melioratio(n-), bettering, ‹ meliorare, make better: see meliorate.] 1. The act or process of making or becoming better; improvement; amelioration.

> Digging yearly about the roots of trees, which is a great means both to the acceleration and melioration of fruits, is practised in nothing but in vines.
> Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 433.

> By an insight into chymistry one may be enabled to make some meliorations (I speak not of transmutations) of mineral and metalline bodies. Boyle, Works, I. 354.

2. pl. In Scots law, improvements made by a tenant upon the property which he rents, and for which he is in certain cases entitled to compensation from the landlord.

meliorator (mē′lyo̤-rā-tọr), n. One who or that which meliorates or makes better.

> The greatest meliorator of the world is selfish, huckstering Trade. Emerson, Works and Days.

meliorism (mē′lyo̤-rizm), n. [‹ L. melior, better (see meliorate), + E. -ism.] 1. The improvement of society by regulated practical means: opposed to the passive principle of both pessimism and optimism.

> Meliorism, instead of an ethical, is a dynamic principle. It implies the improvement of the social condition through cold calculation, through the adoption of indirect means. It is not content merely to alleviate present suffering, it aims to create conditions under which no suffering can exist. L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 468.

2. The doctrine that the world is neither the worst nor the best possible, but that it is capable of improvement: a mean between theoretical pessimism and optimism.

> It may be thought, however, that, if neither optimism nor pessimism is the conclusion to which we are led, the modified doctrine of what is called Meliorism may be accepted. W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 271.

> The only good reason for referring to the source [of the word meliorist is] . . . that you found it useful for the doctrine of meliorism to cite one unfashionable confessor of it in the face of the fashionable extremes.
> George Eliot, Letter to James Sully, Jan. 19, 1877.

meliorist (mē′lyo̤-rist), n. and a. [‹ L. melior, better, + E. -ist.] I. n. One who accepts the practical or the theoretical doctrine of meliorism.

I am not, however, a pessimist—I am, I trust, a rational optimist, or at least a meliorist.
Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 27.

In her general attitude toward life, George Eliot was neither optimist nor pessimist. She held to the middle term, which she invented for herself, of meliorist. She was cheered by the hope and by the belief in gradual improvement of the mass.
Cross, Life of George Eliot, III. 309.

I don't know that I ever heard anybody use the word meliorist except myself.
George Eliot, Letter to James Sully, Jan. 17, 1877.

II. a. Of or pertaining to meliorism or meliorists.

If we adopt either the optimist view or the meliorist view—if we say that life on the whole brings more pleasure than pain, or that it is on the way to become such that it will yield more pleasure than pain, then these actions by which life is maintained are justified, and there results a warrant for the freedom to perform them.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 96.

melioristic (mē-lyo-ris'tik), a. [< meliorist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to meliorism: correlated with optimistic and pessimistic.

Too scientifically melioristic for the common herd.
The Academy, March 3, 1888, p. 148.

meliority (mē-lyor'i-ti), n. [< NL. meliorita(t-)s, < L. melior, better: see meliorate.] The state of being better; betterness. [Rare.]

Aristotle ascribeth the cause of this meliority or betterness unto the aire. Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 613.

This colour of meliority and preëminence is a signe of enervation and weakness.
Bacon, Colours of Good and Evil.

Meliphaga (mē-lif'a-gä), n. [NL., also, erroneously, Melliphagä; neut. pl. of meliphagus:* see meliphagous.] The typical genus of Meliphagidæ. The term has been used with great latitude and little discrimination for all the family and some other birds, but is now restricted to a single species, M. phrygia of Australia, known as the black-and-yellow honey-eater. See honey-eater.

meliphagan (mē-lif'a-gan), n. A bird of the genus Meliphaga; a honey-eater. Also, erroneously, melliphagan.

Meliphagidæ (mel-i-faj'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., also Melliphagidæ; < Meliphaga + -idæ.] A family of tenuirostral oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Meliphaga, belonging to the group Cinnyrimorphæ of the order Passeres; the honey-eaters or honey-suckers. They are closely related to the Nectariniidæ, with which they share the character of the protractile, bifid, and penciled tongue. The bill is of variable length and degree of slenderness, but is always curved, with a prominent culmen; the nostrils are basal, and situated in a large membranous nasal fossa, never entirely covered with feathers; and they are linear or oval in shape, with or without an operculum. The first primary (except in Zosterops and Entomophila) is about half as long as the second. The wings, tail, and feet vary in character with the genera; the anterior toes and their claws are short, the former much united at base, and the hallux is large and strong. The plumage inclines to green and yellow colors; it is never blue, and is red only in one group, the Myzomelinæ. Parts of the head and neck are often bare, and variously wattled or carunculate. The family is confined to the Old World, and is specially characteristic of the Australasian and Polynesian regions, though the range of the Melithreptinæ is much more extensive. The species number nearly 200, referable to about 25 genera. The family is now usually divided into 3 subfamilies: Meliphaginæ, Myzomelinæ, and Melithreptinæ. meliphagidan (mel-i-faj'i-dan), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the family Meliphagidæ.

II. n. A meliphagan or honey-eater.

Meliphaginæ (mel"i-fā-jī'nē), n. pl. [Also Melliphaginæ; NL., < Meliphaga + -inæ.] The typical subfamily of Meliphagidæ. With few exceptions, the group is characteristic of the Australasian and Polynesian regions.

meliphagine (mē-lif'a-jin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the subfamily Meliphaginæ; less strictly, same as meliphagidan.

II. n. A meliphagan or honey-eater of the subfamily Meliphaginæ.

meliphagous (mē-lif'a-gus), a. [Also mellipha-gous; < NL. meliphagus*, < Gr. μέλι, honey, + φαγεῖν, eat.] Feeding upon honey; mellivorous.

meliphanite (mē-lif'a-nīt), n. [< Gr. μέλι, honey, + -φανης, appearing, clear, + *-ite*2.] See melinophane.

melipult†, n. [< Gr. μέλι, honey, + L. pellere, pp. pulsus, drive out. Cf. catapult.] A honey-extractor. Phin, Dict. Apiculture, p. 48.

melisma (mē-lis'mä), n. [NL. (> It.), < Gr. μέλισμα, a song, < μελίζειν, sing, warble, < μέλος, song.] In music: (a) A song, melody, or air, as contrasted with a recitative or declamatory passage. (b) A melodic decoration, grace, fioritura, or roulade. (c) A cadenza.

melismatic (mel-is-mat'ik), a. [= It. melismatico; as melisma(t-) + -ic.] In music: (a) Melodious. (b) Ornamented; adorned.—Melismatic singing or playing, a style of vocal or instrumental performance in which a great number of ornaments, as trills, mordents, runs, etc., are introduced.—Melismatic song, vocal music in which there is more than one note to a syllable: opposed to syllabic song, in which there is only one note to each syllable.

melismatics (mel-is-mat'iks), n. [Pl. of melismatic: see -ics.] In music, the art of florid or decorated vocalization.

Melissa (mē-lis'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < Gr. μέλισσα, Attic μέλιττα, a bee, < μέλι (μελιτ-), honey: see *mell*2.] 1. A genus of plants of the family Menthaceæ, the tribe Saturejeæ, and the subtribe Melisseæ. It is distinguished by a calyx which is distinctly two-lipped, by an exserted corolla-tube, which is recurved-ascending below the middle, and by the divergent anther-cells. They are herbs, with dentate leaves and loose axillary clusters of white or yellowish flowers. About four species are known, from Europe and central and western Asia. M. officinalis, from southern Europe, is the common lemon-balm of the gardens.

2. In zoöl., same as Andrena.

melissa-oil (mē-lis'ä-oil), n. A volatile oil obtained from balm, Melissa officinalis, which gives to the plant its aromatic, lemon-like odor.—Indian melissa-oil, a fragrant oil distilled in India from a species of Andropogon. See Andropogon and lemon-grass. Also called verbena-oil.

Melisseæ (mē-lis'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Melissa + -eæ.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Saturejeæ. The calyx has almost always thirteen quite prominent nerves; the corolla is two-lipped, with the tube usually exserted, and the stamens are ascending at the base and divergent above. It embraces 12 genera, Melissa being the type, and about 191 species. They are usually strong-scented aromatic herbs. The genus Hedeoma, the American pennyroyal, belongs to this subtribe.

melissyl (mē-lis'il), n. [< Gr. μέλισσα, a bee, + ὕλη, matter.] A hypothetical radical ($C_{30}H_{61}$) which occurs in many compounds derived from wax. The more difficultly soluble part of beeswax consists of melissyl palmitate. Also called myricyl.

Melisuga, Melisugæ, etc. See Mellisuga, etc.

Melitæa (mel-i-tē'ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλι(τ-), honey.] 1. In entom., a genus of nymphalid butterflies allied to Argynnis, containing about 50 species, chiefly European and North American, checkered with brown, yellow, and white, and not silvered on the under side, which has bands of white and yellow. M. (Euphydryas) phaëton is a common species of North America. M. (Lemonias) Brucei is found in the western United States. The British species, like those of Argynnis, are known to English collectors as fritillaries.

2. A genus of alcyonarians or sea-fans of the family Isididæ, or giving name to a family Melitæidæ. The polypary is branched as in the gorgonians or true sea-fans, and composed of alternating hard and soft or calcareous and coriaceous joints, the latter much larger than the former, which form bead-like nodes along the stem. M. ochracea is a yellowish coral from the Indian and Pacific oceans. Also Melitæa, Melithæa, Melithea, Melitea.

Melitæidæ (mel-i-tē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melitæa + -idæ.] A family of isidaceous alcyonarian corals, typified by the genus Melitæa, having porous or corky nodes. Also Melithæidæ.

melitæmia (mel-i-tē'mi-ä), n. [NL., irreg. for melithæmia*, < Gr. μέλι(τ-), honey, + αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., the presence of an abnormal quantity of sugar in the blood.

Melitophili (mel-i-tof'i-lī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέλι(τ-), honey, + φίλος, loving.] In Latreille's system, the sixth and last section of Scarabæidæ, composed of the old genera Trichius, Goliathus, and Cetonia. It corresponds more or less exactly with the modern family Cetoniidæ. Also, erroneously, Mellitophili.

melitophiline (mel-i-tof'i-lin), a. Pertaining to the Melitophili, or having their characters; cetonian. Also mellitophiline.

melitose (mel'i-tōs), n. [< Gr. μέλι(τ-), honey, + -ose.] A sugar ($C_{18}H_{32}O_{16} + 5H_2O$) obtained from the manna which falls in opaque drops from various species of Eucalyptus growing in Tasmania. It is a crystalline solid, dextrorotatory, and directly fermentable. Dilute acids hydrolyse it to glucose and melibiose. Also raffinose.

Melitta (mē-lit'ä), n. Same as Andrena.

Melitteæ (mē-lit'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Melittis + -eæ.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ, characterized by a broad calyx and a much-exserted corolla-tube, with the posterior lip broad and somewhat concave. It embraces 6 genera, Melittis being the type, and 9 species, found principally in the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere.

Melittis (mē-lit'is), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < Gr. μέλιττα, Attic form of μέλισσα, a bee: see Melissa.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ, type of the subtribe Melitteæ, characterized by a three-lobed calyx, by having the cells of the anther divergent, and by the flower-cluster usually consisting of six flowers. M. melissophyllum is the only species. See balm, 7, and honey-balm.

melituria (mel-i-tū'ri-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλι(τ-), honey, + οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., glucosuria. Also, erroneously, mellituria.

melituric (mel-i-tū'rik), a. [Also mellituric; < melituria + -ic.] Glucosuric.

Melivora, Melivorinæ, etc. Erroneous forms of Mellivora, etc.

meliza (mē-lī'zä), n. [NL., prop. melizea*, < Gr. μέλι, honey, + ζέα, spelt (NL. zea, maize).] Maize or Indian corn. See the quotation from Smollett under hasty-pudding.

Melizophilus (mel-i-zof'i-lus), n. [NL., < meliza + Gr. φίλος, loving.] A genus of Old World oscine passerine birds of the family Sylviidæ, founded by W. E. Leach in 1816 upon the Dartford warbler, Motacilla undata of Boddaert, now called Melizophilus undatus, provincialis, or dartfordiensis.

Dartford Warbler (Melizophilus undatus).

mell[1] (mel), v. [< ME. mellen, < OF. meller, mesler, etc., mix: see meddle, of which mell is a contracted form.] I. trans. To mix; blend. [Obsolete or provincial.]

All hor colouris to ken were of clene yalow, Withouten more in the mene, or mellit with other.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 5462.

Th' aduerse Cloud, which first receiueth thus Apollo's raies, the same direct repells
On the next Cloud, and with his gold it mells
Her various colours.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 21.

Oft began . . . wintry storms to swell,
As heaven and earth they would together mell.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i. 43.

II. intrans. 1. To mix; mingle. [Obsolete or archaic.]

With men of myght can I not mell.
York Plays, p. 167.

Alas, our society
Mells not with piety.
B. Jonson, Gipsies Metamorphosed.

2†. To meddle; intermeddle or interfere.

Vn-callyd go thou to no counselle;
That longes to the, with that thow melle.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 19.

She would it eeke; and make much worse by telling,
And take great joy to publish it to many,
That every matter worse was for her melling.
Spenser, F. Q., V. xii. 35.

3†. To busy one's self: used reflexively.

Sche melled hire Meliors ferst to greithe.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1719.

4. To contend in fight. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Mony fallyn were fey of the fell Grekes,
But mo of the meny, that mellit hom with.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 5243.

5†. To copulate.

Like certeyn birdes called vultures,
Withouten mellyng conceyven by nature.
Lydgate. (Halliwell.)

mell[2]† (mel), n. [= F. miel = Pr. mel = Sp. miel = Pg. mel = It. mele, miele, < L. mel (mell-) = Gr. μέλι (μελιτ-) = Goth. milith, honey; not found elsewhere in Teut., except as in mildew, q. v. There is an accidentally similar Hawaiian meli, honey.] Honey.

That mouth of hirs, which seemde to flow with mell.
Gascoigne, Dan Bartholomew of Bath.

mell[3] (mel), n. [A var. of mall[1].] A mallet; hence, derisively, the head. [Scotch.]

Her teeth was a' like teather stakes,
Her nose like club or mell.
King Henry (Child's Ballads, I. 148).

There stood a fause lord him behin',
Who thrust him thro' body and mell, O.
The Braes o' Yarrow (Child's Ballads, III. 70).

mell[3] (mel), v. t. [A var. of mall[1], v.] To pound or bruise with or as with a mell or mallet; crush; maul. [Scotch.]

mell[4] (mel), n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of mill[1]. Chaucer.

mell[5] (mel), n. [A var. of meal[3], mole[1].] A stain in linen. Halliwell. [North. Eng.]

mell[6] (mel), n. [Origin obscure.] A warming-pan. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

mellan (mel'an), n. In diamond-mining, same as cascalho.

mella-rosa, n. See mela-rosa.

mellay, n. See melley.

melodusine (mel-ō-dū'sin), a. Having the characters of or pertaining to the Melodusæ; oscine or oscinine; acromyodian.

melody (mel'ō-di), n.; pl. melodies (-diz). [< ME. melody, melodye (= D. melodie = G. melodie, melodei = Dan. Sw. melodi), < OF. melodie, F. melodie = Sp. melodía = Pg. It. melodia, < LL. melodia, < Gr. μελῳδία, a singing, a tune to which lyric poetry is set, < μελῳδός (> LL. melodus), singing, musical, < μέλος, song, strain, melody, + ᾠδή, song, ode: see ode. Cf. comedy.] 1. In general, a succession of agreeable musical sounds; sweet sound; song; tune; music.

Thus endured the ioye and the melodye all the mete while. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 454.

The birds chant melody on every bush.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3. 12.

Specifically—2. In music: (a) A succession of tones, whether pleasing or not. In this sense melody is coördinate with harmony and rhythm as the three necessary constituents of all music. It depends essentially upon tones of relative pitch, successively arranged. (b) A series of tones so related to one another as to produce a distinct musical phrase or idea. The underlying relationship may be variously established: by any particular rhythmic arrangement, as in some popular dance-tunes; by the intervals of a single chord, as in arpeggio phrases; by a diatonic order, as in scale passages; by the harmonic connections between successive chords of which the melody in question forms one of the voice-parts, as in simple choral writing; and by innumerable modifications and combinations of these and similar principles. (c) The principal voice-part in a harmonic composition; usually, now, the soprano, but in older music the tenor; the cantus firmus; the air. (d) A song of clear and balanced form; an air; a tune. A melody is authentic when its compass extends about an octave upward from its key-note or final, plagal when its compass extends about a half-octave above and below the key-note and final. It is diatonic when it uses only the proper tones of the scale in which it is written, chromatic when it uses other tones, foreign to that scale. It is concrete or conjunct when it proceeds by single degrees, upward or downward; discrete or disjunct when it proceeds by steps of more than a single degree. It is syllabic when but one tone is given to each syllable of the words; slurred when more than one tone is given to a syllable. A melody may be further described as popular, national, artistic, etc.

3. A melodious or tuneful poem; a poetical composition suitable for singing.

There are, no doubt, some exquisite melodies (like the "Sabrina Fair") among his [Milton's] earlier poems, as could hardly fail to be the case in an age which produced or trained the authors of our best English glees.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 284.

Imperfect melody, a melody which does not extend throughout the mode in which it is written.—Leading melody. See leading[1].—Syn. Harmony, Rhythm, etc. See euphony.

Meloë (mel′ō-ē), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758); etym. uncertain.] The typical genus of Meloidæ; the oil-beetles, usually referred to the Cantharidæ or blister-beetles proper. It contains those apterous species which have the body large and distended, with the elytra short, oval, and lapping over each other at the base of the suture. When alarmed these insects emit from the joints of the legs a yellowish oily liquor. In some parts of Spain they are used instead of cantharides, or are mixed with them. The larvæ are parasitic in the nests of bees, and are peculiar in undergoing two hypermetamorphoses, thus existing in three distinct larval forms. (See hypermetamorphosis.) The larvæ attach themselves to bees, whose eggs they destroy, and live within the egg-cells, being supported by the honey intended for the young bee; hence they are called bee-lice. It is a very large genus, of wide distribution. Fourteen species inhabit North America.

melograph (mel′ō-gràf), n. [< Gr. μελογράφος, writing songs, < μέλος, song, melody, + γράφειν, write.] An electrical apparatus for recording the order and duration of the notes of a piece of music played on a piano. The depression of the keys is made to close an electric circuit, and the record is made much in the same way that a message is recorded by a Morse telegraph-instrument. The strip of paper is afterward punctured along the marks of the record, and passed through another machine, which, by means of the perforation, closes the circuit of a small electromotor and works a perforator. The perforator is then made to reproduce a stiff paper stencil, which is an exact copy of the written record. The stencil may then be used in the melotrope for the reproduction of the music.

meloid (mē′loid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Meloidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. Any member of the family Meloidæ.

Meloidæ (me-lō′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Meloë + -idæ.] A family of beetles typified by the genus Meloë, or merged in Cantharidæ. The larvæ are parasitic upon other insects, especially Hymenoptera.

melologue (mel′ō-log), n. [< F. mélologue (see quot.), < Gr. μέλος, song, + λέγειν, speak: see -ology. Cf. monologue, etc.] A mixture of speech and song; a recitative; a melodrama. [Rare.]

During a stay in Italy Berlioz composed an overture to King Lear and Le Retour à la Vie, a sort of symphony, with intervening poetical declamation between the single movements, called by the composer a melologue.
Encyc. Brit., III. 598.

Melolontha (mel-ō-lon′thä), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775), < Gr. μηλολόνθη, μηλολάνθη, a kind of beetle or cockchafer.] The typical genus of Melolonthidæ. It is represented in the Old World exclusively, with about 20 species, having the third antennal joint longer than the fourth, the antennal club of the male 7-jointed, that of the female 5-jointed. M. vulgaris is the common cockchafer or dor-bug of Europe, often very destructive.

Melolonthidæ (mel-ō-lon′thi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melolontha + -idæ.] A family of lamellicorn beetles, typified by the genus Melolontha; now generally reduced to a subfamily of Scarabæidæ; cockchafers. The same group of beetles, variously rated in the system, is called Melolonthadæ, Melolonthæ, Melolonthida, Melolonthides, Melolonthites, Melolonthinæ.

melolonthidan (mel-ō-lon′thi-dạn), n. A member of the Melolonthidæ.

melolonthine (mel-ō-lon′thin), a. [< Melolontha + -ine[1].] Of or pertaining to the group of beetles typified by the genus Melolontha.

melomane (mel′ō-mān), n. [< F. mélomane = Sp. melómano; < Gr. μέλος, song, melody, + -μανής, < μαίνεσθαι, be mad.] Same as melomaniac.

melomania (mel-ō-mā′ni-ạ), n. [F. mélomanie = Sp. melomanía; < NL. melomania, < Gr. μέλος, song, melody, + μανία, madness, frenzy.] An inordinate passion for music. Compare musicomania.

melomaniac (mel-ō-mā′ni-ak), n. [< melomania + -ac.] One who has an inordinate passion for music.

melomany (mel′o-mā-ni), n. [< F. mélomanie, < NL. melomania: see melomania.] Same as melomania.

melon[1] (mel′ọn), n. [Formerly also mellon, millon, million (the last still in dial. use); < OF. melon, mellon, millon, F. melon = Sp. melón = Pg. melão = It. melone, a melon, < LL. melo(n-), for L. melopepo(n-) (> OF. melopepon), < Gr. μηλοπέπων, a melon, so called as being apple-shaped, < Gr. μῆλον (L. malum), apple (including also pears, peaches, etc.), + πέπων, a melon: see pepo.] 1. A herbaceous succulent trailing annual plant, Cucumis Melo, family Cucurbitaceæ, or its fruit, the muskmelon. The plant was originally a native of southern Asia and tropical Africa. It has been cultivated from time immemorial in the hot countries of the East, the melons of Persia being specially celebrated, and is now planted wherever there is sufficient summer heat to mature its fruit. The latter at its best is very rich and highly flavored. It is an ellipsoid or globular pepo, the edible part of which is the inner layer of the pericarp, the stringy and watery placentæ with the seeds being rejected. The melon is grown in numberless varieties, as the cantaloup, the nutmeg, etc. In the United States this fruit, in all its forms, is known as muskmelon—melon being applied indifferently to it and the watermelon, or even by preference to the latter. The melon of Numbers xi. 5 is thought by some to have been the watermelon (see def. 2). See abdalavi, cantaloup, Cucumis, and muskmelon.

Have millions at Mihelmas, parsneps in Lent.
Tusser, Husbaudrie, March. (Nares.)

Some grapes and millons from my Lord at Lisbone.
Pepys, Diary, Sept. 27, 1661.

Stumbling on melons as I pass,
Insnared with flowers, I fall on grass.
Marvell, The Garden.

2. The watermelon, Citrullus Citrullus.—3. A melon-shell.—4. A hemispherical mass of blubber taken from the top of the head of the blackfish, grampus, and related cetaceans; melon-blubber. The melon reaches from the spout-hole to the end of the nose, and from the top of the head down to the upper jaw.

The head was dissected on deck; first the melon was removed, then the throat, next the under jaw, and lastly the "head-skin," which is the whaleman's term for the blubber on top of the head. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 299.

Gourd-melon, a pumpkin-like fruit, used in India for curries. See benincasa.—Hairy melon. Same as abdalavi.—Sweet-scented melon, a variety of Cucumis Melo, a kind of muskmelon sometimes regarded as a distinct species. Also called apple-cucumber.

melon[2] (mel′ọn), n. [Abbr. of pademelon or paddy-melon.] Same as pademelon.

melon-blubber (mel′ọn-blub″ėr), n. The melon of a cetacean. See melon[1], 4.

melon-cactus (mel′ọn-kak″tus), n. See Melocactus.

melon-caterpillar (mel′ọn-kat″ėr-pil-är), n. The larva of a common pyralid moth, Diaphania hyalinata. It is yellowish-green, 1¼ inches long, and is destructive to melons and other pepos or cucurbitaceous fruits.

Melongenidæ (mel-on-jen′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melongena (< Gr. μῆλον, apple, + γένος, kind), the typical genus, + -idæ.] A family of proboscidiferous rachiglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Melongena. The animal has the head elongated, narrow lateral teeth with an enlarged outer cusp, and the shell more or less pyriform. Also Melongenæ, as a subfamily.

melon-hole (mel′ọn-hōl), n. A hole made by the pademelon or padmelon, very dangerous for horsemen: often applied to other similar holes. [Australian.]

The plain is full of deep melon holes, and the ground is rotten and undermined with rats.
A. C. Grant, Bush-life in Queensland, I. 220.

meloniform (mel′ọn-i-fôrm), a. Melon-shaped.

melon-oil (mel′ọn-oil), n. The oil of the melon of a cetacean. It is valuable for lubricating watches and other fine machinery, and is by some preferred to porpoise-oil.

melon-shaped (mel′ọn-shāpt), a. Having the form of a melon; oval with depressed lines running from end to end, the intervals between them being convex, so that a transverse section in any part has a scalloped outline. This form is found in many fruits, seeds, the eggs of insects, etc.

melon-shell (mel′ọn-shel), n. The shell of a mollusk of the genus Melo.

melon-thick (mel′ọn-thik), n. A West Indian name of the common melon-cactus, Cactus Melocactus.

melon-thistle (mel′ọn-this″l), n. A melon-shaped cactus, as those of the genus Cactus.

melon-tree (mel′ọn-trē), n. The papaw, Carica Papaya.

melon-worm (mel′ọn-wėrm), n. Same as melon-caterpillar.

Melopelia (mel-ō-pē′li-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλος, song, + πέλεια, a dove, rock-pigeon.] A genus of the family Columbidæ and subfamily Zenaidinæ; the white-winged doves. They have the outer primary normal; the tail rounded, shorter than the wing, and 12-feathered; the bill slender, black, and as long as the tarsus; a large bare circumorbital space; the neck with metallic luster; a blue-black auricular spot; a large white mark on the wings; and the sexes alike in plumage. M. leucoptera is a common dove of the southwestern parts of the United States, conspicuous by reason of the white on the wings.

White-winged Dove (Melopelia leucoptera).

Melophagus (mē-lof′a-gus), n. [NL., < Gr. μῆλον, a sheep, + φαγεῖν, eat.] A genus of pupiparous parasitic insects of the dipterous family Hippoboscidæ, founded by Latreille in 1802. M. ovinus, a well-known wingless species, is the common sheep-tick. The genus is also called Melophila and Melophaga.

melophone (mel′ō-fōn), n. [< Gr. μέλος, a song, + φωνή, voice.] A kind of concertina.

melophonic (mel-ō-fon′ik), a. [< Gr. μέλος, song, + φωνή, voice, + -ic.] Pertaining to music or its performance.

melophonist (mel′ō-fō-nist), n. [< Gr. μέλος, song, + φωνή, voice, + -ist.] A singer of melodies.

Here, as in the case of the Hebrew melophonists, I would insinuate no wrong thought.
Thackeray, A Dinner in the City, iii.

melopiano (mel″ō-pi-an′ō), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλος, song, + It. piano: see piano.] A form of pianoforte, invented by Caldara in 1870, on which a sustained tone, with a chance for crescendo and diminuendo effects, is made possible through an ingenious arrangement of little hammers that strike rapidly upon the strings and thus prolong and control their vibration. The quality of the tone produced is sweet and effective.

meloplast (mel′ō-plast), n. [< Gr. μέλος, song, + πλάστης, a molder, modeler, < πλάσσειν, form: see plastic.] A system of teaching the rudiments of music, invented by P. Galin in 1817, by which many of the complications of the ordinary notation are avoided at first.

meloplasty (mel′ō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. μῆλα, pl., the cheeks (pl. of μῆλον, apple), + πλάσσειν, form: see plastic.] In surg., the transplantation of tissue to supply new material for the cheeks when a considerable part has been destroyed by disease or injury.

melopœia (mel-ō-pē′yä), n. [LL., < Gr. μελοποιία, a making of lyric poems, musical composition, < μέλος, song, + ποιεῖν, make: see poet.] The art or science of constructing melodies; melodics.

Melopsittacus (mel-op-sit′a-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλος, song, + ψιττακός, a parrot.] An Australian genus of small long-tailed parrots; the grassparrakeets. M. undulatus is one of the commonest and prettiest parrots of the aviaries, and one of the few which breed in confinement. The birds are amiable and sociable, with more melodious notes than is usual in this family.

Zebra Grass-parrakeet (Melopsittacus undulatus).

Melospiza (mel-ō-spī′zä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέλος, song, + σπίζα, a finch.] A genus of the finch family, Fringillidæ, founded by Baird in 1858, containing a number of fully spotted and streaked species peculiar to North America; the song-sparrows. The best-known is the common song-sparrow, M. melodia, which abounds in most parts of the United States and runs into several varieties in the West. M. cinerea is a much larger and otherwise distinct species found in Alaska. Two common sparrows of eastern parts of the United States and of Canada are the swamp-sparrow, M. palustris, and Lincoln's finch, M. lincolni.

Melothria (mē-loth′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < Gr. μῆλωθρον, white bryony, the wild vine.] A genus of cucurbitaceous plants, type of the tribe Melothrieæ, or cucumber tribe. The male flowers are usually in racemes, the anthers subsessile, frequently with a 2-lobed connective produced from the apex, and the fruit usually on a long and slender peduncle. It embraces about 60 species, inhabiting the warmer regions of both hemispheres. They are mostly graceful vines, either climbing or prostrate, with membranaceous palmately lobed or divided leaves, simple tendrils, and small yellow or white flowers. M. pendula, the creeping cucumber (which see, under cucumber), is the best-known species.

melotrope (mel′ō-trōp), n. [< Gr. μέλος, song, + τροπή, a turn, turning, < τρέπειν, turn.] A piano fitted with a mechanical device for automatically reproducing a piece of music by means of a melograph stencil.

Statue of Melpomene, in the Louvre Museum.

The melotrope is merely mechanical in its operation, and is intended, as far as possible, to imitate the motion of the fingers in playing upon the keys of the instrument.
Sci. Amer., N.S., [LIX. 376.

mel-pell†, adv. Same as pell-mell.

Without any examination had to know where the fault was, [a band of men] slew mel-pell both guilty and innocent, to the number of 7,000.
Hooker, Eccles. [Polity, viii. 9.

Melpomene (mel-pom′e-nē), n. [L., < Gr. Μελπομένη, one of the Muses, prop. ppr. fem. of μέλπεσθαι, sing.] 1. In class. myth., originally, the Muse of song and musical harmony, looked upon later as the especial patroness of tragedy. She is generally represented as a young woman, bearing the tragic mask and often the club of Hercules, and with her head wreathed with vine-leaves in token of her relation with the dramatic deity, Bacchus. 2. A planetoid, the eighteenth in order of discovery, first observed by Professor Hind at London in 1852.

melrose (mel′rōz), n. [< NL. mel rosæ: L. mel, honey; rosæ, gen. of rosa, rose.] Honey of roses, a preparation consisting of powder of red rose, clarified honey, and diluted alcohol.

What I used was a mixture of melrose with sixteen drops of the muriatic acid.
Sir W. Fordyce, On Muriatic Acid, p. 8.

melt[1] (melt), v.; pret. melted, pp. melted (or molten), ppr. melting. [< ME. melten (pret. malt, pp. molten), < AS. meltan, miltan (pret. mealt, pp. molten), melt, = Icel. melta, melt, digest; Gr. μέλδειν, liquefy, melt; cf. OBulg. mludŭ, soft. Akin to malt[1], milt[1].] I. intrans. 1. To become liquid through heat; be changed from a fixed or solid to a flowing state by heat.

This Pandare that neyghe malt for wo and routhe.
Chaucer, Troilus, i. 582.

These fellows commonly, which use such deceitfulness and guiles, can speak so finely that a man would think butter should scaut melt in their mouths.
Latimer, Misc. Selec.

O, that this too too solid flesh would melt,
Thaw, and resolve itself into a dew!
Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 129.

2. To suffer dissolution or extinction; be dissipated or wasted.

All the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away.
Ex. xv. 15.

My heart melted away in secret raptures.
Addison, Vision of Mirza.

3. To be softened to love, pity, tenderness, sympathy, or the like; become tender, mild, or gentle.

I should melt at an offender's tears.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 126.

They say women have tender hearts; I know not; I am sure mine melts.
Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, v. 3.

4. To be weakened or broken; be subdued, as by fear.

As soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man. Josh. ii. 11.

5. To pass, as one thing into another, so that the point of junction is imperceptible; pass by imperceptible degrees; blend; shade.

The twilight melted into morn.
Tennyson, Day-Dream, The Departure.

II. trans. 1. To reduce from a solid to a fluid state by means of heat; liquefy; fuse: as, to melt iron, lead, wax, or tallow; to melt ice.

When sun doth melt their snow. Shak., Lucrece, l. 1218.

Get me some drink, George; I am almost molten with fretting. Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, iii. 5.

Inscriptions, victories, buildings, and a thousand other pieces of antiquity [on coins] were melted down in these barbarous ages. Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

2. Loosely, to make a solution of; liquefy by solution; dissolve: as, to melt sugar in water.—3. Figuratively, to soften, as by a warming and kindly influence; render gentle or susceptible to mild influences, as to love, pity, or tenderness.

For pity melts the mind to love. Dryden.

Her noble heart was molten in her breast.
Tennyson, Princess, vi.

=Syn. To mollify, subdue; Melt, Dissolve, Thaw, Fuse. Two words, . . . popularly confounded, though scientifically very distinct, are melt and dissolve. The former signifies to bring a substance from a solid to a liquid condition by the agency of heat alone; the latter signifies the bringing about of this result by distributing the particles of the substance acted on among the particles of another substance which is itself liquid, and this process is termed the solution of the solid substance. Thaw differs from melt in being applicable only to substances whose ordinary condition is that of a liquid, and which have become solid in consequence of the abstraction of heat, and therefore return to the liquid condition as if of themselves. (Chambers's Journal.) Dissolve is much used as a synonym of either melt or thaw. Fuse is sometimes synonymous with melt (as, to fuse a wire by electricity), but it is more often used of melting together: as, bell-metal is made by fusing copper and tin. See the definitions of these words.

melt[1] (melt), n. [< melt[1], v.] 1. The melting of metal; the running down of the metal in the act of fusion.—2. The charge of metals placed in a cupola or pot for melting.

12,867 melts of ingots were made for coinage during the year. Rep. of Sec. of Treasury, 1886, p. 175.

3. Any substance that is melted.

The melt is then allowed to cool, and is dissolved in a large quantity of water and neutralized with hydrochloric acid. Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 216.

melt[2] (melt), n. Same as milt[2].

meltable (mel′ta-bl), a. [< melt[1] + -able.] Capable of being melted; fusible.

Iron . . . is the most impure of all metals, hardly meltable. Fuller, Worthies, Salop, II. 253. (Davies.) meltada (mel-tä′dä), n. [E. Ind.] A murine rodent found in Madras, Golunda meltada. J. E. Gray.

melter[1] (mel′tėr), n. 1. One who melts; specifically, the official in a mint who superintends the melting of gold and silver for coining.

The melter melteth in vayne, for the euell is not taken away from them. Bible of 1551, Jer. vi. 29.

Thou melter of strong minds.
Beau. and Fl., False One, ii. 3.

The entire melting requires about sixteen hours, and is carefully watched by the master melter, who urges the furnaces to their utmost intensity.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 250.

2. A furnace, pot, or crucible used for melting any substance; a melting-pot: as, a melter for combining the ingredients in the manufacture of sealing-wax. Workshop Receipts.

melter[2] (mel′tėr), n. Same as milter.

melting (mel′ting), p. a. 1. Disposed to melt or soften; feeling or showing tenderness; tender; compassionate.

To kindle cowards, and to steel with valour
The melting spirits of women.
Shak., J. C., ii. 1. 122.

One whose subdued eyes,
Albeit unused to the melting mood,
Drop tears. Shak., Othello, v. 2. 349.

2. Adapted to melt or soften; affecting; moving: as, a melting speech.

As the mind is pitched, the ear is pleased With melting airs or martial. Cowper, Task, vi. 3.

★melting-furnace (mel′ting-fėr″nās), n. A glass-makers' furnace in which the frit for the glass is melted before it goes to the blowing-furnace. In some manufactories the glass is worked from the melting-furnace direct.

meltingly (mel′ting-li), adv. [< melting + -ly[2].] In a melting manner; in a manner to melt or soften; by the process of melting. [Rare.]

Zelmane lay upon a bank, that, her tears falling into the water, one might have thought she began meltingly to be metamorphosed to the running river.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia.

meltingness (mel′ting-nes), n. [< melting + -ness.] The quality of melting; capability of being softened by some warming and kindly influence. [Rare.]

Give me, O thou Father of compassion, such a tenderness and meltingness of heart that I may be deeply affected with all the miseries and calamities, outward or inward, of my brethren. Whole Duty of Man, Collect for Charity.

melting-pan (mel′ting-pan), n. A pan, usually in the lower part of a sugar-refinery, in which raw sugar is reduced to a syrup with water aided by heat and mechanical stirring, and from which the syrup is pumped to the blow-ups in the upper part of the refinery to be treated with lime for the precipitation of albuminous and other organic impurities.

melting-point (mel′ting-point), n. The point or degree of temperature at which a solid body melts; the point of fusion or fusibility. See fusion.

melting-pot (mel′ting-pot), n. A crucible.

meltith (mel′tith), n. [Probably a form of meal-tide.] A meal. [Scotch.]

melton (mel′ton), n. [From Melton Mowbray, in Leicestershire.] A stout kind of cloth for outer wear, the surface of which is without nap, and is neither pressed nor finished.

In the treatment of broad-cloth, doeskins, meltons, and all nap-finished cloth, the milling is carried so far that the fibres become densely matted. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 661.

melungeon (me-lun′jon), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps ult. < F. mélange, a mixture: see mélange.] One of a class of people living in eastern Tennessee, regarded as of mixed white and Indian blood.

They resented the appellation Melungeon, given to them by common consent by the whites, and proudly called themselves Portuguese. Boston Traveller, April 13, 1889.

Melursus (me-lėr′sus), n. [NL., irreg. < L. mel, honey, + ursus, bear.] An Indian genus of Ursidæ, characterized by the shaggy hide, protrusile lips, and fewer and smaller teeth than those of Ursus; honey-bears or sloth-bears. M. labiatus is the aswail (which see). Prochilus is a synonym.

melvie (mel′vi), v. t.; pret. and pp. melvied, ppr. melvying. [A dial. var. of meal[1], v., < ME. mele,

< AS. melu (melw-), meal: see meal[1].] To soil with meal. [Scotch.]

Sma' need has he to say a grace,
Or melvie his braw claithing.
Burns, Holy Fair.

Melyridæ (me-lir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Melyris + -idæ.] A family of malacodermatous beetles, corresponding to Latreille's Melyrides, typified by the genus Melyris.

Melyrides (me-lir'i-dēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Melyris.] In Latreille's classification, the third tribe of Malacodermi, or soft pentamerous beetles. The palpi are generally filiform and short; the mandibles notched; the antennæ mostly serrated, in some males pectinated; the joints of the tarsi entire; and the ungues unidentate or furnished with a membranous appendage. These beetles are mostly very agile, and are found upon flowers. Malachius, Dasytes, Zygia, Pelecophorus, and Diglobicerus are named as leading genera.

Melyris (me-lī'ris), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775); origin obscure.] The typical genus of Melyridæ. These insects are ordinarily found upon flowers; they are generally of small size and very gaily colored. Most of them are natives of Africa.

mem. An abbreviation of memorandum, placed before a note of something to be remembered.

member (mem'bėr), n. [< ME. membre, < OF. (and F.) membre = Sp. miembro = Pg. It. membro, < L. membrum, a limb, member of the body, a part, portion, or division.] 1. An integral part of an animal body having a distinct function; a vital organ; particularly, in common use, one of the limbs or extremities, as a leg, an arm, or a wing.

Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Jas. iii. 5.

Where I was wont to feed you with my blood,
I'll lop a member off, and give it you.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3. 15.

2. Specifically, the private parts.

Thei gon alle naked, saf a litylle Clout, that thei coveren with here Knees and hire Membres.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 197.

3. Figuratively, anything likened to a part of the body.

Baptism; wherein I was made a member of Christ.
Book of Common Prayer, Catechism.

Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?
1 Cor. vi. 15.

The Body of the Law is no less encumbered with superfluous Members, that are like Virgil's Army, which he tells us was so crowded many of them had not Room to use their weapons. Addison, Spectator, No. 21.

4. A part of any aggregate or whole; one of a number of associated parts or entities; any unit or division that can be considered separately as part of a total.

The figures and the membres of thine Astrolabe.
Chaucer, Prol. to Astrolabe.

They tax our policy, and call it cowardice;
Count wisdom as no member of the war.
Shak., T. and C., i. 3. 198.

Specifically — (a) A person considered in relation to any aggregate of individuals to which he belongs; particularly, one who has united with or has been formally chosen as a corporate part of an association or public body of any kind, as a church or a society: often used elliptically in England for a member of Parliament, and in the United States for a member of Congress.

There are not more useful members in a commonwealth than merchants. Addison, The Royal Exchange.

He [Sir John Dalrymple] was strenuously supported by Sir James Montgomery, member for Ayrshire.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiii.

(b) A part of a discourse, or of a period or sentence; a clause; a part of a verse. (c) In arch., any subordinate part of a building, order, or composition, as a frieze, cornice, or molding. (d) In alg., either of the two parts or sides of an equation united by the sign of equality (=). (e) In zoöl. and bot., a component of any higher classificatory group: thus, a species is a member of a genus; a genus is a member of a family, etc. — Borough member, in the British Parliament, a member of the House of Commons representing a borough. — County member, in the British Parliament, a member of the House of Commons representing a county or a division of a county. — Divisive members. See divisive. = Syn. 1. Member, Limb. Limb is a precise term, in the human body applying to the arms and legs. We speak of the limb of a tree, but rarely apply limb to the leg of an animal. The word has little figurative use, except in science (see definition); such expressions as "limb of the law," for a lawyer, and "limb of the devil" for a rogue, are jocose, limb being used for member or part. Member is much freer in primary and in figurative uses for an integral or distinguishable part of a whole: as, a member of a sentence, of a family, of a society, of a state. "The tongue is a little member" (James iii. 5), and so is the eye, and each of the toes, but none of them is a limb.

membered (mem'bėrd), a. [< member + -ed[2].] Having members; espècially, having limbs: used chiefly in composition, as big-membered; in her. (also membré), used when the limbs are of a different tincture from the body.

memberless (mem'bėr-les), a. [< member + -less.] Destitute of members; simple or undivided.

membership (mem'bėr-ship), n. [< member + -ship.] 1. The state of being a member; the office or position of a member, as of Parliament.

No advantages from external church membership or profession of the true religion can of themselves give a man confidence towards God. South, Sermons, II. xi.

Jeffrey is perhaps on his way to Edinburgh to-day. He is a candidate for the Membership there. Carlyle, in Froude.

2. The members of a body regarded collectively: as, the whole membership of the church.

membra, n. Plural of membrum.

Membracidæ (mem-bras'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Membrax (< Gr. μέμβραξ, a kind of cicada) + -idæ.] A family of homopterous Hemiptera with three-jointed tarsi, typified by the genus Membracis. It is a large group of extraordinarily diversified and grotesque forms, the prothorax especially being the seat of remarkable modifications. The coloration is not less diversified. The antennæ are short and setose, with thickened base beneath the expanded edge of the clypeus, below or a little before the eyes. The legs are short and stout, and the hind tibiæ are furnished with a terminal circlet of spines. The species, of which there are upward of 800, are all jumpers, and are generally known as tree-hoppers. They abound in tropical and subtropical America, where more than half the known species are found; there are many in Africa, some in Australia and the East Indies, but scarcely any in Europe.

membracine (mem'brā-sin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Membracidæ.

II. n. A member of the family Membracidæ.

Membracis (mem'brā-sis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1776), < Gr. μέμβραξ (μεμβρακ-), a kind of cicada.] A genus of tree-hoppers, typical of the family Membracidæ, having the two forward pairs of tibiæ broadly flattened and fitted very closely against the breast. It is very rich in species, among which are some of the most gaily colored and beautifully decorated members of the family.

membral (mem'bral), a. [< NL. membralis*, < L. membrum, a limb, member: see member.] In anat. and zoöl., of or pertaining to the limbs of an animal, as distinguished from the body proper; appendicular, as distinguished from axial (parts of the whole body). — Membral segment, a natural morphological division of a limb between two principal joints: thus, the forearm, between the elbow and the wrist, is a membral segment. See isomere.

membranaceous (mem-brā-nā'shius), a. [< L. membranaceus, of skin or membrane, < membrana, skin, membrane: see membrane.] Pertaining to or of the nature of membrane; consisting of membrane; membranous.

Birds of Prey that live upon Animal Substances have membranaceous, not muscular stomachs.
Arbuthnot, Aliments, vi. 8.

★ membrane (mem'brān), n. [< F. membrane = Sp. Pg. It. membrana, < L. membrana, the skin or membrane that covers the several members of the body, the thin skin of plants, a skin parchment (> Gr. μεμβράνα, parchment), cover, surface, < membrum, member: see member.] 1. A thin pliable expansive structure of the body; an expansion of any soft tissue or part in the form of a sheet or layer, investing or lining some other structure or connecting two or more structures. The term is used in the widest sense, with little or no reference to the kind of tissue which may be concerned, the membranous quality depending upon thinness and pliability, not upon texture or fabric. No hard parts, as bone and cartilage, come within the definition of membrane. Most membranes are fibrous — that is, consist wholly or in part of some form of connective tissue, in or on which may be other and more special form-elements, as the layers of cells peculiar to the mucous, the serous, and other special membranes. In some cases a sheet of nerve-tissue, or of muscle-tissue, constitutes a membrane, with little admixture of other elements. Some membranes chiefly consist of a network of blood-vessels, with little connective tissue. Most membranes are specified by qualifying terms. See phrases following.

2. In entom., specifically, the membranous terminal part of a hemielytrum; the membrane of the fore wing of a hemipter. See cut under clavus. — 3. A skin prepared for being written on.

They consist of three bundles, containing in all 549 skins or membranes. Of these membranes, the greater part are vellum and parchment.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. xliv.

Adipose, alveolar, atrial membrane. See the adjectives. — Alimentary mucous membrane. See alimentary. — Arachnoid membrane, araneous membrane. Same as arachnoid, 2. — Basal membrane of the ligula, in certain Coleoptera, a narrow membranous part between the mentum and the ligula. When more fully developed it is called the hypoglossis. — Basement membrane. See basement. — Basilar membrane. See basilar. — Blastodermic membrane, the blastoderm. — Branchiostegal, bronchial, cellular membrane. See the adjectives. — Choroid membrane, the choroid. — Conjunctival membrane, the conjunctiva. — Costocoracoid membrane. See costocoracoid. — Cricothyroid membrane, the tough fibrous tissue which connects the cricoid and thyroid cartilages. — Deciduous membrane, the decidua. — Diphtheritic membrane, in pathol., the false membrane formed in diphtheria, composed of necrosed epithelium, or of an exudate of pus, fibrin, and epithelial scales, or of these with necrosed epithelium. — False membrane, in pathol., an unorganized membraniform layer, such as is produced in croupous inflammation, when it is formed of pus and fibrous and necrosed epithelium in varying amounts. — Fenestrated membrane. See fenestrated. — Fibroserous membrane. See fibroserous. — Germinal, Henlean, Henslovian, hyaloid, hyoglossal membrane. See the adjectives. — Interosseous membrane, a tough sheet of fascia connecting two bones in their continuity: especially applied to such a tissue between the ulna and the radius, and between the tibia and the fibula. — Investing membrane, the first layer of cells which assumes a distinctly membranous form upon the surface of the cicatricula of the ovum. It was formerly called the serous layer of the germinal membrane. — Jacob's membrane, the bacillary layer, or layer of rods and cones of the retina of the eye. See bacillary. — Krause's membrane, a membrane dividing the muscle-fiber transversely, supposed to be indicated by the intermediate line in the light disk of striated muscle-fiber. Also called Dobie's line, Dobie's stripe. — Limiting membrane of the retina, external and internal, the outer and inner boundaries of the fibers of Müller, presenting the appearance of continuous membranes, the outer lying between the outer nuclear layer and the layer of rods and cones, and the inner being next to the hyaloid membrane. — Membrane of Bruch, a structureless or finely fibrillated transparent membrane, lying between the choriocapillaris and the pigmented layer of the retina. — Membrane of Corti. Same as tectorial membrane. — Membrane of Demours, or membrane of Descemet, a transparent, glassy lamina, covering posteriorly the proper tissue of the cornea, itself lined with a single layer of epithelioid cells. Also called posterior elastic lamina. — Membrane of Henle. Same as Henlean membrane. — Membrane of Reissner, the membrane which separates the scala vestibuli of the cochlea from the cochlear canal or scala media. It extends obliquely from the spiral lamina to the outer wall of the cochlea. It is a very delicate layer of connective tissue continuous with the periosteum of the upper surface of the bony lamina, and lined with pavement epithelium on its lower side. — Mucous membrane, the general lining membrane of the alimentary canal and its annexes, including the respiratory and urogenital passages. It is one of the most extensive and the most complex of the membranes of the body, varying greatly in character in different cases, and in different parts of its own extent, and may include various special glandular structures, as mucous crypts, follicles, etc., as well as the appropriate nerves, blood-vessels, and lymphatics. Mucous membrane consists essentially of a basement membrane (see basement), which separates a free epithelial from a fibrovascular attached layer. The epithelium is a layer of cells of various kinds, as spheroidal, columnar, ciliated, etc.; the fibrovascular layer consists of connective tissue with vessels, lymphatics, nerves, and often muscular fibers. Embedded in this membrane may be also the glandular structures above mentioned; and the surface is often thrown up into various ridges, villi, and papillæ. The structure is essentially a secreting one, giving rise to mucous as well as to various other special secretions. At the openings of the body the mucous membrane is directly continuous with the skin. The conjunctiva of the eye is also a mucous membrane. — Nasmyth's membrane, the cuticula dentis, or cuticle of a tooth; the epithelial investment of the enamel of a young tooth, which persists for a while and then wears off. — Nictitating membrane, the winking membrane or winker; the third eyelid. It is very highly developed in some animals, as birds, in which it can be swept across the whole eye by means of appropriate muscles and tendons (see cut at eye[1]), but in many others it is rudimentary or wanting. In essential character it is a fold of the conjunctival mucous membrane which when little developed, or when not in action, lies at the inner canthus of the eye. — Obturator membrane. (a) The membrane or ligament nearly closing the obturator foramen. (b) The occluding membrane of the fetal brain which closes the upper part of the fourth ventricle. — Pituitary membrane, the mucous membrane of the nose; the membrane lining the nasal passages, continuous with that of the pharynx, ear, eye, and various sinuses of the skull. In a part of this membrane ramify the nerves of smell. Also called Schneiderian membrane. — Pupilary membrane, a delicate transparent vascular membrane of the fetal eye which closes the pupil for a time, and divides the space in which the iris is suspended into two distinct chambers. It is sometimes persistent, causing blindness. — Schneiderian membrane, the pituitary membrane: so called from the anatomist Schneider, who first showed the nasal mucus to be the product of this membrane, not of the brain, as had before been supposed. — Semilunar membrane, in ornith., the membrane of the syrinx or lower larynx. It is a delicate, highly vibratile membrane, with a free concave upper margin ascending in the trachea from the pessulus or cross-bar of the syrinx, and constitutes a part of the vocal organs, like a vocal cord of the larynx of a mammal. — Serous membrane, a thin membrane of connective tissue, of mesoblastic origin, lined with a simple layer of flattened epithelial cells. These cells are joined together along lines which are sometimes straight but usually sinuous or jagged. Between them here and there are openings (stomata) of lymphatic vessels. Membranes of this kind line certain cavities of the body, and are reflected over the contained viscera, forming in this way a shut sac, moistened with lymph and communicating with the lymphatic vessels through the stomata. The best examples of serous membranes are the pleuræ, the pericardium, the peritoneum, and the tunicæ vaginales. — Subradular membrane, a membrane situated under the radula or lingual ribbon of the odontophore of a mollusk. — Synovial membrane, the membrane which lines the joints and secretes synovia or synovial fluid, the glairy substance which lubricates the joint and facilitates its movements. The membrane passes gradually into the articular cartilage. Such membranes consist chiefly of connective tissue, with vessels and nerves, covered here and there with patches of epithelial cells. — Tectorial membrane, in anat., a strong elastic membrane in the cochlear canal of the ear, lying above and parallel with the basilar membrane, extending outward from the limbus spiralis part way toward the outer wall of the cochlea, and covering the Cortian organ, upon the rods of which it rests. It is thin at its origin at the limbus spiralis, then thickens, and again tapers toward the free outer extremity. Also called membrane of Corti. — Thyrohyoid mem- brane, the fibrous membrane which connects the hyoid bone with the thyroid cartilage.—Tympanic membrane, the membrane which occludes the external meatus of the ear and separates it from the middle ear.—Undulating membranes, simple membranous bands, one margin attached, the other free, exhibiting undulatory motion. Micrographic Dict.—Vibratile membrane. Same as semilunar membrane.—Vitelline membrane, the proper coat or wall of an ovum, inclosing the vitellus or yolk: it corresponds to the cell-wall of any other cell. Also called zona pellucida, from its pellucid appearance in some cases, as in the human ovum.

membrane-bone (mem′brān-bōn), n. An ossification in membrane of any kind; a bone which has any other origin than in cartilage. The bones of the skeleton of vertebrates are for the most part preformed in cartilage, which is resorbed during the process of ossification; but some, as those of the face, of the top and sides of the skull, those found in tendons and other fibrous structures, as the bones of the eyeball, heart, penis, etc., of various animals, and all dermal bones, or those of the exoskeleton, are membrane-bones.

membraneless (mem′brān-les), a. [< membrane + -less.] Not provided with a membrane: as, a membraneless cell.

membranella (mem-brā-nel′ä), n.; pl. membranellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. membrana, membrane: see membrane.] In zoöl., same as cirrus, 2 (i).

membraneous (mem-brā′nē-us), a. [< LL. membraneus, of a membrane or parchment, < L. membrana, membrane: see membrane.] Same as membranous.

membrane-suture (mem′brān-sū″tūr), n. In the hemielytrum of a heteropterous insect, the suture between the basal harder part or corium and the terminal part or membrane.

membrane-winged (mem′brān-wingd), a. In entom., hymenopterous.

membraniferous (mem-brā-nif′e-rus), a. [< L. membrana, membrane, + ferre = E. *bear*1.] Having or producing membrane.

membraniform (mem′brā-ni-fôrm), a. [< L. membrana, membrane, + forma, form.] Having the characteristics of a membrane; membranous in form; laminar; lamellar; fascial.

membranocoriaceous (mem″brā-nō-kō-ri-ā′shius), a. [< L. membrana, membrane, + corium, hide, + -aceous. Cf. coriaceous.] Of a thick, tough, membranous texture or consistency, as a polyzoan.

membranology (mem-brā-nol′ō-ji), n. [< L. membrana, membrane, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of membranes; a treatise on membranes. [Rare.]

membranosus (mem-brā-nō′sus), n.; pl. membranosi (-sī). [NL.: see membranous.] A muscle of the thigh; the semimembranosus.

membranous (mem′brā-nus), a. [= F. membraneux, < NL. membranosus, < L. membrana, membrane: see membrane.] 1. Having a membrane or membranes; membraniferous.—2. Consisting of membrane; having the texture or quality of a membrane; membranaceous.—3. Of or pertaining in any way to membrane; resembling membrane; membraniform.—4. In bot., having the character or appearance of membrane; thin, rather soft and pliable, and often more or less translucent, as sometimes leaves, the walls of seed-vessels, the indusia in ferns, etc. See phrases below.—Membranous croup, labyrinth, etc. See the nouns.—Membranous mycelium, a mycelium in which the hyphæ form a membranous layer by interweaving. See mycelium.—Membranous ossification. See membrane-bone.

membranule (mem′brā-nūl), n. [= F. membranule, < L. membranula, dim. of membrana, a membrane: see membrane.] 1. A little membrane.—2. In entom., a small triangular flap or incurved portion on the posterior part of the base of the wings, seen in certain dragon-flies.

membré (F. pron. moṅ-brā′), a. [F., < membre, member: see member.] In her., same as membered.

membrum (mem′brum), n.; pl. membra (-brä). [L.: see member.] In anat., a member: technically distinguished from truncus.

Memecyleæ (mem-ē-sil′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), < Memecylon + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the natural order Melastomaceæ, characterized by having a definite number of ovules, and a fruit containing from 1 to 5 seeds, the latter with large embryos. It embraces 5 genera, of which Memecylon is the type, and about 148 species, natives of the tropics.

Memecylon (me-mes′i-lon), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), < L. memecylon, < Gr. μμαίκυλον, μεμαίκυλον, μεμαίκυλος, the fruit of the arbutus or strawberry-tree.] A large genus of plants of the family Melastomaceæ, and type of the tribe Memecyleæ, characterized by having 8 anthers and a 1-celled ovary containing 1 seed. They are smooth trees or shrubs with entire coriaceous leaves, and axillary clusters of small blue or white flowers. About 110 species have been described, natives of Asia, Africa, tropical Australia, and some of the islands in the Pacific.

memento (mē-men′tō), n. [= F. mémento, a reminder, < L. memento, remember, 2d pers. sing. impv. of meminisse, remember; a redupl. perf., < √ men, think: see *mind*1. It should be noted that memento is not connected with memory, remember, etc.] A hint, suggestion, notice, or memorial to awaken memory; that which reminds; a reminder of what is past or of what is to come; specifically, a souvenir.

> He is but a man, and seasonable mementos may be useful. Bacon.
>
> Brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, v.
>
> At length she found herself decay;
> Death sent mementos every day. Cotton, Fables, v.
>
> These [paralytics] speak a loud memento. Cowper, Task, i. 482.

=Syn. Souvenir, etc. (see memorial), remembrancer.

memento mori (mē-men′tō mō′ri). [L., remember to die, i. e. that thou must die; usually translated, 'remember death': memento, 2d pers. sing. impv. of meminisse, remember (see memento); mori, die (see *mort*1, *mort*2).] A decorative object, usually an ornament for the person, containing emblems of death or of the passing away of life: common in the sixteenth century.

> I make as good use of it as many a man doth of a Death's-head or a memento mori. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 3. 35.

memina (me-min′ä), n. [Cingalese mīminnā.] 1. The peesoreh, a deerlet of Ceylon, Tragulus memina. Also meminna.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of such small deer, separated from Moschus by J. E. Gray.

Memnonian (mem-nō′ni-an), a. [< L. Memnonius, < Gr. Μεμνόνιος, Μεμνόνειος, of Memnon, < Μέμνων, L. Memnon, Memnon: see def.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling Memnon, an Oriental or Ethiopian hero in the Trojan war, slain by Achilles. He was a solar hero, son of the Dawn (Ēos), or of Day (Hemera), symbolized as a youth of marvelous beauty and strength. The Greeks gave his name to one of the colossi of Amenophis III. at Thebes in Egypt, the vocal Memnon, and called one of the temples there the Memnonium or temple of Memnon. See Memnonium.

> Xerxes, the liberty of Greece to yoke,
> From Susa, his Memnonian palace high,
> Came to the sea. Milton, P. L., x. 308.

Memnonium (mem-nō′ni-um), n.; pl. Memnonia (-ä). [< Gr. Μεμνόνειον, a temple of Memnon, neut. of Μεμνόνειος, of Memnon, < Μέμνων, Memnon.] 1. A temple of Memnon. The name was given by the Greeks to an ancient temple at Susa in Persia, and also to the temple still so called at Thebes in Egypt, properly the Rameseum or temple of Rameses II. See Memnonian.

> And thou hast walked about (how strange a story!)
> In Thebes's streets three thousand years ago,
> When the Memnonium was in all its glory.
> H. Smith, Address to the Mummy at Belzoni's Exhibition.

2. [l. c. or cap.] The ancient Greek name for the settlement or suburb adjoining the cemetery of an Egyptian city, consisting of extensive establishments for the mummification of the dead, and of the dwellings of the numerous artisans employed in these establishments and in the various professions, arts, and trades connected therewith. Also memnoneion.

> Here stood, where the field of the colossi is now, the Memnoneion. C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 218.

memoir (mem′wor or mē′mōr), n. [< F. mémoire, memoir, < L. memoria, memory: see memory.] 1†. A note of something to be remembered; a memorandum.

> He desired a Memoir of me, which I gave him, of what I would have him search for in the King's Cabinet, and promised me all the Satisfaction he could give me in that Affair. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 97.
>
> There is not in any author a computation of the revenues of the Roman empire, and hardly any memoirs from whence it might be collected. Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins.

2. A notice or an essay relating to something within the writer's own memory or knowledge; a record of facts upon a subject personally known or investigated; a concise account of one's knowledge or information on any topic; especially, a communication to a society containing such information: as, the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.—3. pl. A narrative of the facts or events of some phase of history or in the life of a person, written from personal knowledge or observation; a history or narrative dwelling chiefly upon points about which the writer is specially informed, as an autobiography or a continuous record of observations. Such narratives are generally limited to a special line of facts or series of events, as Guizot's Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps, 'Memoirs to serve for the History of my Time.'

> He told me he had studied the History of Books with the utmost application 18 years, and had brought his Memoirs into a good Method. Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 100.
>
> To write his own Memoirs, and leave his Heirs
> High Schemes of Government, and Plans of Wars. Prior, Carmen Seculare, st. 33.

4. In a restricted use, a biography; a memorial volume or work containing notices of the life and character of some one deceased, with extracts from his (or her) correspondence, etc. =Syn. 4. Biography, Memoir. See biography.

memoiret, n. A Middle English form of memory.

mémoire (mā-mwor′), n. [F.: see memoir.] In diplomacy, same as memorandum, 4.

memoirism (mem′wor-izm), n. [< memoir + -ism.] The act or art of writing memoirs.

> Reducing that same memoirism of the eighteenth century into history. Carlyle, Misc., II. 242. (Davies.) memoirist (mem′wor-ist), n. [< memoir + -ist. Cf. memorist.] A writer of memoirs; a biographer.

> Sir William Temple, the lively, agreeable, and well-informed essayist and memoirist. Craik, Hist. Eng. Lit., II. 135.
>
> Carlo was beginning to swear "fit to raise the dead," writes the memoirist, at the tardiness of the Norman pair. G. W. Cable, Stories of Louisiana, ii.

memorabilia (mem″ō-rą-bil′i-ä), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of memorabilis, worthy to be remembered or noted: see memorable.] 1. Things remarkable and worthy of remembrance or record.

> All the memorabilia of the wonderful childhood. Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, p. 33.

2. Things that serve to recall something to memory; things associated with some person, place, or thing that is held in remembrance.

memorability (mem″ō-rą-bil′i-ti), n. [< memorable: see -bility.] Memorableness. [Rare.]

> Many events of local memorability. Southey, The Doctor, xlvii. (Davies.) memorable (mem′ō-rą-bl), a. and n. [= F. mémorable = Sp. memorable = Pg. memoravel = It. memorabile, < L. memorabilis, worthy to be remembered or noted, remarkable, < memorare, bring to remembrance, mention: see memorate.] I. a. 1. Worthy to be remembered; such as to be remembered; not to be forgotten; notable; remarkable: as, the memorable names of history; memorable deeds; a memorable disaster.

> I passed through part of that forrest, which is called Fontaine Beleau forrest, which is very great and memorable for exceeding abundance of great massy stones. Coryat, Crudities, I. 34 (sig. E).
>
> Witness our too much memorable shame
> When Cressy battle fatally was struck. Shak., Hen. V., ii. 4. 53.
>
> Neither the praise of his wisedom or his vertue hath left him memorable to posterity. Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.
>
> On this memorable day [that of the battle of the Boyne] he was seen wherever the peril was greatest. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xvi.

2†. Keeping in remembrance; commemorative.

> I wear it [the leek] for a memorable honour;
> For I am Welsh, you know, good countryman. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 7. 109.

=Syn. 1. Signal, extraordinary, famous.

II.† n. An event worthy of being kept in memory; a noteworthy or remarkable thing.

> He that will be throughly acquainted with the principall antiquities and memorables of this famous citie, let him reade a Latin Tract of one Symphorianus Campegius. Coryat, Crudities, I. 74.
>
> To record the memorables therein. Fuller, Church Hist., X. vi. 24.

memorableness (mem′ō-rą-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being memorable.

memorably (mem′ō-rą-bli), adv. In a manner not to be forgotten; so as to be worthy of remembrance.

memorandt, a. [ME., = Sp. Pg. memorando, < L. memorandus, to be remembered: see memorandum.] Memorable.

> Are he were ded and shuld fro hem wende
> A memorand thyng to have yn mynde. MS. Harl. 1701, f. 84. (Halliwell.) memorandum (mem-ō-ran′dum), n.; pl. memoranda (-dä), less commonly memorandums (-dumz). [= F. memorandum, < L. memorandum, neut. of memorandus, to be remembered, gerundive of memorare, bring to remembrance: see memorate.] 1. Something to be remembered: used, originally as mere Latin, and usually abbreviated mem., to introduce a note of a thing to be done. Hence—2. A note to help the memory; a record of something for future reference or consideration.

And over against this memorandum (of the King's own hand), "Otherwise satisfied."
Bacon, Hist. Henry VII., p. 212.

Stings, conscious stings, have made my heart their Butt, Graving outrageous Memorandums there
Of those snakes tongues which Aphrodisius shot
Into my heedless breast. J. Beaumont, Psyche, ii. 147.

I have never seen any work from nature of Millet's that was not memorandum-like in character, indicating by outline and shadow the principal contour.
The Century, XXXVIII. 97.

Specifically—3. In law, a writing in which the terms of a transaction or some part of them are embodied. The statute of frauds requires a note or memorandum in writing to make a valid sale in certain cases; and under this statute a letter may be a sufficient memorandum. The term is often used in the caption memorandum of agreement, with which formal contracts are begun.

4. In diplomacy, a summary of the state of a question, or a justification of a decision agreed on. Also (as French) mémoire.—Memorandum articles, in marine insurance, things referred to in the memorandum clause annexed to some policies, exempting the insurers from liability for the articles therein specified.—Memorandum check, a bank check with "memorandum" or "mem." on the face of it. The legal effects of such an addition to the face of a check are that the drawer is liable upon it absolutely to the one to whom he gives it, and will not be exonerated by delay or omission to present it at the bank; and, on the other hand, it is not, like an ordinary check, a representation that the drawer has any funds in the bank. But the bank may pay it like any other check if presented. The object of a memorandum check is to serve as a formal due bill, usually with an understanding between the parties as to the desired delay in presentation for the convenience of the drawer, or that it shall never be presented at the bank, but to the drawer at a future time.—Memorandum of association, in Eng. law, a document signed by shareholders, stating the name, object, etc., of a joint-stock company, upon the registration of which the company has a legal existence. It corresponds to the articles of association in the American law of corporations.—Memorandum sale, the sending of goods by an intending seller to a proposing buyer, subject to the approval of the latter, the title remaining in the seller until the buyer indicates his approval or acceptance of the goods. R. Miller, Law of Conditional Sales.=Syn. 2. Souvenir, Memento, etc. See memorial.

memorandum-book (mem-ọ-ran′dum-bůk), n. A book in which memoranda are written; a note-book.

With memorandum-book for every town.
Cowper, Prog. of Err., l. 373.

memorandumer (mem-ọ-ran′dum-ėr), n. One who makes memoranda; one who is given to taking notes or jotting down casual observations. [Rare.]

I feel sorry to be named or remembered by that biographical anecdotical memorandummer [Boswell] till his book of poor Dr. Johnson's life is finished and published.
Madame D'Arblay, Diary, III. 335. (Davies.)

memorate† (mem′ọ-rāt), v. t. [< L. memoratus, pp. of memorare (> It. memorare = Sp. Pg. memorar = OF. membrer, menbrer, F. mémorer), bring to remembrance, mention, recount, < memor, remembering: see memory. Cf. commemorate and remember.] To mention for remembrance; commemorate.

memorative (mem′ọ-rā-tiv), a. [= F. mémoratif = Sp. Pg. It. memorativo; as memorate + -ive.] 1. Of or pertaining to memory: as, the memorative faculty or power.—2. Preserving or recalling the memory of something; aiding the memory. [Archaic and rare.]

The mind doth secretly frame to itselfe memorative heads, whereby it recalls easily the same conceits.
Bp. Hall, Holy Observations, No. 87.

Vernal weather to me most memorative.
Carlyle, in Froude.

memoria (mẹ-mō′ri-ạ), n.; pl. memoriæ (-ē). [ML., < L. memoria, memory: see memory.] 1. A shrine or reliquary containing relics of some martyr or martyrs. In primitive times it was customary to carry the memoria in religious processions.—2. A church or chapel built in memory of a martyr or confessor, often over his tomb. Cath. Dict.

Pg. memorial = It. memoriale, < L. memorialis, of or belonging to memory or remembrance, < memoria, memory: see memory.] I. a. 1. Preservative of memory; serving for commemoration: as, a memorial tablet; a memorial window in a church.

Thou Polymnya,
On Parnass that with thy sustres glade, . . .
Syngest with vois memorial in the shade.
Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 18.

Last o'er the urn the sacred earth they spread,
And raised the tomb, memorial of the dead.
Pope, Iliad, xxiv. 1008.

Where still the thorn's white branches wave,
Memorial o'er his rival's grave.
Scott, L. of L. M., iv. 34.

2. Contained in one's memory; within the memory of man: opposed to immemorial. [Rare.]

The case is with the memorial possessions of the greatest part of mankind: a few useful things mixed with many trifles fill up their memories. Watts.

Memorial cross. See *cross*1, 2.—Memorial day a day observed in memory of something; specifically, in the United States, same as Decoration day (which see, under decoration).—Memorial stone or tablet, a stone or tablet set up, or placed on or in a wall, to commemorate some person or event.

II. n. 1. That which preserves the memory of something; anything designed or adapted to serve as a reminder of a person, an event, or a fact or facts of any kind belonging to past time, as a record, a monument, an inscription, a custom, a periodical observance, etc.: as, the "Memorial of St. Helena," a book by Las Cases; the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford.

These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever. Josh. iv. 7.

Memorials are history unfinished, or the first or rough draughts of history.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 126.

There is a memorial for the dead, as well in giving thanks to God for them as in praying for them.
J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 291.

He lingered, poring on memorials
Of the world's youth. Shelley, Alastor.

Nations whose memorials go back to the highest antiquity. J. Milne, in Faiths of the World.

2. In law: (a) A short note or abstract, intended for registry, exhibiting the particulars of a deed, etc. (b) In Scots law, a statement of facts bearing upon a particular point, doubtful or disputed, in order to obtain counsel's opinion upon that point; a statement of facts or points in dispute for the use or advice of counsel; a brief.—3. A written representation of facts made to a legislative or other body as the ground of a petition, or a representation of facts accompanied with a petition.—4. In diplomacy, one of a class of informal state papers much used in negotiations, embracing such documents as circulars sent to foreign agents, answers to the communications of ambassadors, and notes to foreign cabinets and ambassadors.—5†. Memory; remembrance; that which is remembered (about a person or thing).

Their memorial is perished with them. Ps. ix. 6.

Precious is the memorial of the just. Evelyn.

6†. Eccles. See commemoration, 2 (b).=Syn. 1. Memorial, Monument, Memento, Souvenir, and Memorandum agree in meaning that which puts one in mind or helps one to remember; all but memorandum are especially means of keeping a revered or endeared person, place, etc., in memory. A memorandum is simply a note made in order to prevent the forgetting of something important, especially something which might easily slip from the mind. Memento and souvenir differ very slightly, souvenir being a somewhat more elevated word: we give a book or a lock of hair as a memento; we prize a faded flower as a souvenir of a visit to Mount Vernon with friends now separated from us. Memorial and monument are sometimes the same: as, the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford is essentially a monument. A monument is often a single shaft or column, as the Washington monument; a memorial may be a commemorative structure, an illuminated window, a book, etc.

A memorial is the more affectionate; monument, the more laudatory.
C. J. Smith, Synonyms Discriminated, p. 565.

memorialise, v. t. See memorialize.

memorialist (mẹ-mō′ri-ạl-ist), n. [= F. mémorialiste = Sp. It. memorialista; as memorial + -ist.] 1. One who writes a memorial or memorials.

They would have the commemoration of their actions be transmitted by the purest and most untainted memorialists. Steele, Spectator, No. 188.

2. One who presents a memorial to a legislative or any other body, or to a person.

memorialize (mẹ-mō′ri-ạl-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. memorialized, ppr. memorializing. [< memorial + -ize.] 1. To present a memorial to; petition by memorial.

The Senate of Massachusetts refused to memorialize Congress for a female suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution. The American, VI. 173.

2. To commemorate.

This latter work [the Annunciation] was executed for Bernardo Cavalcanti, one of the three commissioners who represented the Republic on the entrance of the Florentine army into Pisa, which event it was intended to memorialize. C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 94.

And does not permit any good memorizable series.
The American, VIII. 396.

memorization (mem″ọ-ri-zā′shọn), n. [< memorize + -ation.] The act of memorizing, or of committing to memory.

In Baden the . . . memorization of Latin words is disapproved of. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 426.

memorize (mem′ọ-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. memorized, ppr. memorizing. [< memor-y + -ize.] 1. To cause to be remembered; make memorable; perpetuate the memory of, as by writing or inscription.

In vain I thinke, right honourable Lord,
By this rude rime to memorize thy name.
Spenser, To Lord of Buckhurst, Verses prefixed to F. Q.

Except they meant to bathe in reeking wounds,
Or memorize another Golgotha.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 2. 40.

2. To keep in memory; hold in lasting remembrance; have always in mind.

From her
Will fall some blessing to this land, which shall
In it be memorized. Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 52.

And would but memorize the shining half
Of his large nature that was turned to me.
Lowell, Agassiz, i. 4.

3. To commit to memory; learn by heart.

memorizer (mem′ọ-rī-zėr), n. One who commits to memory.

The examination system of England compels men to cram—to become mere memorizers of facts.
Science, XIII. 309.

★ memory (mem′ọ-ri), n.; pl. memories (-riz). [< ME. memorie, also memoire, < OF. memorie, memoire, memore, F. mémoire = Sp. Pg. It. memoria, < L. memoria, the faculty of remembering, remembrance, memory, a historical account, < memor, mindful, remembering; cf. Gr. μέρμερος, anxious, μέριμνα, care, thought, Skt. √ smar, remember. From L. memor are also ult. E. memorial, memorate, commemorate, remember, etc.] 1. The mental capacity of retaining impressions, and of recalling ideas to consciousness with the attendant perception that these (or their objects) have a certain relation to the past, or the generic name for the totality of such revived and recognized ideas; in a narrower sense, retention alone, the process of recall being termed recollection. The application of the term is often extended, figuratively, to analogous physical processes.

The power to revive again in our minds those ideas which after imprinting have disappeared, or have been as it were laid aside out of sight, . . . is memory.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. x. 2.

In memory there is necessarily some contrast of past and present, in retentiveness nothing but the persistence of the old. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 47.

Every organ—indeed, every area and every element—of the nervous system has its own memory.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 553.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 4. 101.

A thousand fantasies
Begin to throng into my memory.
Milton, Comus, l. 206.

Writing by memory only, as I do at present, I would gladly keep within my depth.
Swift, Improving the English Tongue.

Men once world-noised, now mere Ossian forms
Of misty memory. Lowell, Agassiz, iv. 1.

3. Length of time included in the conscious experience or observation of an individual, a community, or any succession of persons; the period of time during which the acquisition of knowledge is possible.

How first this world and face of things began,
And what before thy memory was done.
Milton, P. L., vii. 637.

The Gild of Stratford-upon-Avon, . . . whose beginning was from time whereunto the memory of man runneth not. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. xxiii.

4. The state of being remembered; continued presence in the minds or thoughts of men; retained or perpetuated knowledge; posterior note or reputation: as, to celebrate the memory of a great event.

Tyndale, Ans. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), p. 67.

O my sweet master! O you memory
Of old Sir Rowland!
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 3. 3.

7. Commemoration; perpetuation of the knowledge of anything; a recalling to mind: as, a monument erected in memory of a person.—8†. An act or ceremony of remembrance; a service for the dead: same as commemoration, 2 (b).

Their Diriges, their Trentals, and their shrifts,
Their memories, their singings, and their gifts.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 454.

And I am told that there are women of title who boldly demand memories to be celebrated when there are no communicants: and that there are mass priests who celebrate memories in the very time and place that the ordinary ministers are celebrating the Communion.
Bucer, quoted in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., xviii.

Legal memory, in Eng. law, the period since the beginning of the reign of Richard I.— Sound and disposing mind and memory, the phrase usual in statutes prescribing what persons may make wills, and generally construed to imply ability to collect and hold in mind the particulars both of the estate to be disposed of and of the persons standing in such a relation as to have just expectations.—To commit to memory. See commit.—To draw to memory†, to put on record.

A noble storie,
And worthy for to drawen to memorie.
Chaucer, Prol. to Miller's Tale, l. 4.

=Syn. 1-4. Memory, Recollection, Remembrance, Reminiscence. Memory is the general word for the faculty or capacity itself; recollection and remembrance are different kinds of exercise of the faculty; reminiscence, also, is used for the exercise of the faculty, but less commonly, and then it stands for the least energetic use of it, the matter seeming rather to be suggested to the mind. The correctness of the use of memory for that which is remembered has been disputed. The others are freely used for that which is remembered. In either sense recollection implies more effort, more detail, and more union of objects in wholes, than remembrance. Reminiscence is used chiefly of past events, rarely of thoughts, words, or scenes, while recollection is peculiarly appropriate for the act of recalling mental operations. See remember.

Memphian (mem'fi-an), a. [< Memphis + -an.] Same as Memphite.

★ Busiris and his Memphian chivalry. Milton, P. L. i. 307.

> J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, iv. 1.

mendicate† (men'di-kāt), v. i. [< L. mendicatus, pp. of mendicare, mendicari (> It. mendicare = Pr. Sp. Pg. mendigar = F. mendier, > E. obs. maund[3], q. v.), beg, < mendicus, poor, needy, beggarly; as a noun, a beggar; ulterior origin unknown.] To beg or practise begging.

mendication† (men-di-kā'shon), n. [< mendicate + -ion.] The act or habitual practice of begging.

> Two grave and punctual authors . . . omit the history of his [Belisarius's] mendication. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 17.

mendicience†, n. [ME., equiv. to mendicance*: see mendicancy.] Mendicancy.

> There hath ben great discord . . .
> Upon the estate of mendicience.
> Rom. of the Rose.

mendicity (men-dis'i-ti), n. [< ME. mendicitee, < OF. mendicite, F. mendicité = Sp. mendicidad = Pg. mendicidade = It. mendicità, < L. mendicita(t-)s, beggary, pauperism, < mendicus, beggarly: see mendicate.] 1. The state or condition of a beggar; beggarliness.

> For richesse and mendicitee
> Ben cleped two extremytees.
> Rom. of the Rose, l. 6525.

In the case of professional authors, mendicity often trails mendacity along with it. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 38.

2. The practice of begging; beggary; mendicancy.

mendinant†, n. [ME., < OF. mendinant, ppr. of mendiner, mendiener, beg, < mendien, mandien, mendiant, mendicant, begging: see mendiant, mendicant.] A mendicant or begging friar.

> Therfore we mendynantz, we sely freres,
> Ben wedded to poverte and continence.
> Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 198.

mending (men'ding), n. [Verbal n. of mend, v.] 1. A yarn composed of cotton and wool, and prepared for darning the so-called merino stockings made on the stocking-loom: used chiefly in the plural.—2. Articles collectively that require to be mended.

mendipite (men'di-pīt), n. [< Mendip (see def.) + -ite[2].] A rare oxychlorid of lead, usually occurring in fibrous or columnar radiated masses, also crystallized, of a white color and pearly luster. It is found in the Mendip hills, Somerset, England.

mendment† (mend'ment), n. [< ME. mendment; by apheresis from amendment.] 1. Amendment.

> Such a grace was hir lent
> That she come to mendment.
> MS. Cantab. Ff. v. 48, f. 43. (Halliwell.)
>
> By that mendment nothing else he meant
> But to be king, to that mark he was bent.
> Mir. for Mags., p. 355.

2. Fertilizing; manuring. [Prov. Eng.]

> This writer's flood shall be for their mendment or fertility, not for their utter vastation and ruin. Bp. Gauden, Hieraspistes (1653), Pref. (Latham.) mendozite (men-dō'zīt), n. [< Mendoza (see def.) + -ite[2].] In mineral., soda alum, occurring in white fibrous masses near Mendoza, Argentine Republic.

mends (mendz), n. pl. [By apheresis from amends.] Amends; requital; remedy. [Now chiefly prov. Eng.]

> All wrongs have mendes, but no amendes of shame. Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 20.
>
> If she be fair, 'tis the better for her: an she be not, she has the mends in her own hands. Shak., T. and C., i. 1. 68.

mene[1]†, v., n., and a. A Middle English form of mean[1], mean[2], etc.

mene[2]†, n. A Middle English form of meiny.

mene[3] (mē'nē). A Chaldaic word, signifying 'numbered.'

> And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. Dan. v. 25, 26.

Mene[4] (mē'nē), n. [NL., < Gr. μήνη, the moon: see moon.] A genus of acanthopterygian fishes whose species have silvery hues like moonlight, typical of the family Menidæ. Lacépède, 1803.

meneghinite (men-e-gē'nīt), n. [After Prof. Meneghini (1811–89), a mineralogist, of Pisa University.] A sulphid of antimony and lead having a lead-gray color and bright metallic luster, occurring in orthorhombic crystals, also in massive forms with fibrous structure.

menepernour†, n. Same as mainpernor.

menevair†, n. See miniver.

men-folks (men'fōks), n. pl. The men of a household or community collectively. [Colloq.]

> Is it because they are the burden-carriers of the community, carrying in the creels strapped on to their backs loads that the men-folks would scarcely lift from the ground? Harper's Mag., LI. 182.

meng†, menge†, v. Obsolete forms of ming[1], ming[2].

mengcorn†, n. See mangcorn.

mengite (men'jīt), n. [After Menge, the discoverer.] A black mineral occurring in small crystals in granite veins in the Ilmen mountains, Urals. Its exact nature is doubtful; it may be identical with columbite.

mengle†, v. and n. An obsolete form of mingle.

menhaden (men-hā'dn), n. [Also manhaden; a corruption of Narragansett Indian munnawhatteaûg (Roger Williams), lit. 'fertilizer,' a name applied to the menhaden, herring, and alewife, all being used by the Indians for manuring their corn-fields.] A clupeoid fish, Brevoortia tyrannus. It has the appearance of a shad, but is still more compressed, has a large head, and the scales are closely imbricated, leaving a high narrow surface exposed, while their posterior margins are pectinated. The jaws and mouth are toothless, and there is a deep median emargination of the upper jaw. The intestinal canal is very long, and the chief food is obtained from mud taken into the stomach. It is one of the most important economic fishes of the eastern coast of the United States; it ranges from 25° to 45° north latitude, and in the summer occurs in the coast-waters of all the Atlantic States from Maine to Florida, but in winter only south of Cape Hatteras. It is the most abundant fish on the eastern coast of the United States. Formerly it was used almost solely for manure, but large quantities are now converted into oil, and many are canned in oil, to be sold as "sardines," like the European fishes so named. It attains a length of from 12 to 16 inches, is bluish above with silvery or brassy sides, the fins usually tinged yellowish or greenish, and has a dark scapular blotch, often with smaller spots behind it. It varies a good deal in details of form and color with age, and to some extent with season and locality. This fish has at least 30 different popular names in the United States, the leading ones being mossbunker, with many variants (see mossbunker), pogie or pogy and its variants, alewife or oldwife, whiting or whitefish, bony-fish, bugfish (which see), hardhead, fatback, chebog, pilchard (a misnomer), schooly, shiner, pauhagen (poghaden, pookagan, etc.), yellowtail, green-tailed shad, shadine (as put up in oil), and sardine. The name menhaden extends in literary use to all the other species of Brevoortia, of which there are several, as B. patronus of the Gulf of Mexico; and it is locally misapplied to the thread-herring, Opisthonema thrissa. See cut under Brevoortia.

menhir (men'hir), n. [< Corn. maenhir, < Corn. and W. maen, a stone (cf. dolmen, cistvaen), + hir, long. Cf. longstone.] In archæol., one of a class of monumental stones of greater or less antiquity, found in various parts of Europe, also in Africa and in regions of Asia, especially in the Khassian hills. They are very abundant in Brittany, France. They are usually tall and massive, either entirely rough or partly cut, and are set upright in or on the ground, either singly or in groups, alinements, circles, or other combinations. See megalithic.

Group of Menhirs at Carnac, Brittany.

> All can trace back the history of the menhirs from historic Christian times to non-historic regions, when these rude stone pillars, with or without still ruder inscriptions, were gradually superseding the earthen tumuli as a record of the dead. Fergusson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 60.

menial (mē'ni-al), a. and n. [Early mod. E. menyall, < ME. meineal, meyneal, < OF. (AF.) mesnial, menial, meignal, pertaining to a household, < meisnee, maisnee, etc., a household: see meiny.] I. a. 1. Belonging to a retinue or train of servants; serving.

> Also an Act was made, That no Lord, nor other, might give any Liveries to any but their Household and Menial Servants. Baker, Chronicles, p. 164.
>
> Lo! the sad father, frantic with his pain,
> Around him furious drives his menial train.
> Pope, Iliad, xxiv. 292.

2. Pertaining to servants or domestic service; servile.

> The women attendants perform only the most menial offices. Swift, Gulliver's Travels.
>
> Freebooters, sprung from low castes, and accustomed to menial employments, became mighty Rajahs. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

II. n. A domestic servant; one of a body of household servants: now used chiefly as a term of disparagement.

> That all might mark—knight, menial, high, and low.
> Cowper, Hope, l. 312.
>
> Hired servants are of three kinds: menials, day-laborers, and agents. A menial is one who dwells in the household of the master, and is employed about domestic concerns, under a contract, express or implied, to continue service for a certain time. Robinson, Elem. of Law, 123.

menialty† (mē'ni-al-ti), n. [< menial + -ty. Cf. menalty.] Common people collectively.

> The vulgar menialty conclude therefore it is like to increase, because a hearnshaw (a whole afternoone together) sate on the top of Saint Peter's church in Cornehill. Nash, Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1613). (Nares.)

Menidæ (men'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mene[4] + -idæ.] A family of scombroidean acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Mene. The body is much compressed and the abdomen prominent and trenchant, the mouth very protractile, the dorsal very long and entire, the anal also very long and commencing just behind the ventrals, and the ventrals elongated and complete. Mene maculata is an inhabitant of the Indian Ocean.

menilite (men'i-līt), n. [< Ménil(montant) (see def.) + -ite[2].] A variety or subspecies of opaline silica found at Ménilmontant, a quarter in the eastern part of Paris. It is found in kidney-shaped masses of the size of the hand or larger, sometimes in globules of the size of a nut. It has usually a dull grayish or bluish color.

meningeal (mē-nin'jē-al), a. [< meninx, pl. meninges, + -al.] Of or pertaining to the meninges.—Meningeal arteries, the arteries supplying the dura mater of the brain, the principal one being the middle or great meningeal from the internal maxillary.

meninges, n. Plural of meninx.

meningitic (men-in-jit'ik), a. [< meningitis + -ic.] Relating or pertaining to meningitis; affected with meningitis.

meningitis (men-in-jī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane (see meninx), + -itis.] Inflammation of the membranes of the brain or spinal cord.—Epidemic cerebrospinal meningitis, an infectious disease which in ordinary cases is characterized by an acute invasion with violent headache, severe pains and stiffness in the neck, and great malaise, more or less fever, sometimes a chill, and sometimes vomiting. The subsequent course varies greatly, but usually presents severe headache and backache and retraction of the head, tenderness along the spine, often vertigo, stupor, frequently delirium, sometimes convulsions, sometimes vomiting, with paralysis of the ocular and facial muscles or abnormal stimulation of the same. The spinal nerves exhibit more or less disturbance; herpes facialis is frequent, and other skin affections, such as petechiæ, roseola, and urticaria. The spleen may be slightly but is not greatly enlarged. The disease lasts from two to four weeks in many cases, but it may be fatal in a few days, or a severe invasion may be followed by equally speedy recovery; on the other hand, it may last for eight weeks or more. It is most frequent in children, but adults are not exempt. The infectious agent is a specific bacterium called Weichselbaum's diplococcus, or Diplococcus intracellularis meningitidis, found in great numbers in the cerebrospinal fluid. Anatomically, the disease presents a purulent leptomeningitis of the cerebrospinal axis. Also called black fever, cerebrospinal fever, congestive fever, malignant meningitis, malignant purpuric fever, neuropurpuric fever, pestilential purpura, petechial fever, phrenitis typhodes, purple fever, spotted fever, typhoid meningitis, typhus petechialis.—Tubercular meningitis. See tubercular.

meningocele (mē-ning'gō-sēl), n. [< Gr. μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane, + κήλη, a tumor.] In pathol., hernia of the meninges or cranial membranes; cerebral hernia confined to the membranes.

meningococcus (mē-ning'gō-kok-us), n. [NL., < Gr. μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane, + κόκκος, a kernel.] A coccus supposed to be the cause of cerebrospinal fever.

meningorachidian, meningorhachidian (mē-ning"gō-rā-kid'i-an), a. [< Gr. μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane, + ῥάχις (ῥαχιδ-), the spine.] Pertaining to the meninges or membranes of the spinal cord and to the rachis or spine: as, the meningorachidian veins. See spinal.

meninguria (men-ing-gū'ri-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane, + οὖρον, urine.] Urine containing membranous shreds.

meninting (me-nin'ting), n. [Javanese.] A three-toed kingfisher, Ceyx meninting.

meninx (mē'ningks), n.; pl. meninges (mē-nin'jēz). [NL., < Gr. μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane, esp. of the brain.] In anat., a membrane; especially, one of the three membranes that invest the brain and spinal cord. They are the dura mater, the arachnoid, and the pia mater, named in order from without inward. See these words.

meniscal (mē-nis'kal), a. [< meniscus + -al.] Pertaining to or having the form of a meniscus.

meniscate (mē-nis'kāt), a. [< meniscus + -ate[1].] Resembling the section of a meniscus: applied in botany to a cylindrical body bent into a semicircle.

menisciform (mē-nis'i-fôrm), a. [< Gr. μηνίσκος, a crescent (see meniscus), + L. forma, form.] Of the form of a meniscus or crescent.

meniscoid (mē-nis'koid), a. [< Gr. μηνίσκος, a crescent, + εἶδος, form.] Like a meniscus; crescent-shaped; concavo-convex.

meniscoidal (men-is-koi'dal), a. [< meniscoid + -al.] Same as meniscoid.

meniscus (mē-nis'kus), n.; pl. menisci (-ī). [< NL. meniscus, < Gr. μηνίσκος, a crescent, dim. of μήνη, the moon: see moon.] 1. A crescent or crescent-shaped body. Specifically—2. A lens, convex on one side and concave on the other, and thicker in the center, so that its section presents the appearance of the moon in its first quarter. As the convexity exceeds the concavity, a meniscus may be regarded as a convex lens (also called a converging meniscus); the corresponding form in which the convexity is less than the concavity is sometimes but improperly called a diverging meniscus. See cut under lens.

Meniscus, def. 2.

3. The convex or concave surface of a liquid, caused by capillarity: thus, the mercury in a barometer has a convex meniscus, but spirit or water a concave meniscus. —4. In anat., an interarticular fibrocartilage, of a rounded, oval, disklike, or falcate shape, situated between the ends of bones, in the interior of joints, attached by the margins. Such cartilages are found in man in the temporomaxillary, the sternoclavicular, and sometimes the acromioclavicular articulations, and in the wrist- and knee-joints.

Forms of Meniscus, def. 3. 1, concave; 2, convex.

5. A bronze plate or disk, anciently placed upon the head of a statue, to protect it from the rain, or from being soiled by birds.

menise†, n. [< ME. menuse, < OF. menuise, menuse, menuze, any small object, small fish, small fry, < menutser, make small, minish: see minish.] 1. Small fish; small fry.—2. A minnow.

> The little roach, the menise biting fast.
> John Dennys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 167).

menison†, menson†, n. [< ME. menison, menisoun, menysoun, menesoun, < OF. meneison, menoison, menuison, menison, menisoun, maneson, dysentery, diarrhea, < LL. manatio(n-), a flowing: see manation.] Diarrhea; dysentery.

> Bothe meseles & mute, and in the menyson blody.
> Piers Plowman (B), xvi. 111.

Menispermaceæ (men"i-spėr-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Menispermum + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, of which the genus Menispermum is the type, belonging to the order Ranales. It is characterized by small, usually three-parted, dicœcious flowers, with the petals shorter than the sepals, and solitary seeds, which are attached by the ventral face, and have the micropyle above. The family embraces about 84 genera and 390 species, the number of which may, however, be greatly reduced; they are found principally within the tropics, although a few occur in North America, western Asia, and Australia. They are principally woody climbers, with alternate leaves and clusters of small flowers. The plants possess active narcotic and bitter properties, some being very poisonous, while others are used as tonics. It includes 4 tribes, the Cocculeæ, Tinosporeæ, Limacieæ, and Pachygoneæ.

menispermaceous (men"i-spėr-mā'shius), a. Of, pertaining to, or having the characters of, the Menispermaceæ.

menispermal (men-i-spėr'mal), a. [< Menispermum + -al.] Relating to the Menispermaceæ; having moon-shaped seeds or organs.

menispermate (men-i-spėr'māt), n. [< menisperm-ic + -ate[2].] A compound of menispermic acid and a base.

menispermic (men-i-spėr'mik), a. [< menispermum + -ic.] Obtained from the seeds of the menispermaceous plant Cocculus Cocculus: applied to an acid.

menispermine (men-i-spėr'min), n. [< menispermum + -ine[2].] An alkaloid extracted from the shells of the fruit of Cocculus Cocculus. It is tasteless and medicinally inert. See Cocculus.

Menispermum (men-i-spėr'mum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1705), so called from the half-moon shape of the seeds; < Gr. μήνη, the moon, + σπέρμα, a seed.] 1. A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants, type of the family Menispermaceæ, the moonseed family, and belonging to the tribe Cocculeæ, characterized by having the embryo horseshoe-shaped, and by having from twelve to an indefinite number of stamens. They are climbing plants, with partially peltate, palmately lobed or angled leaves, flowers in panicles, and the fruit a compressed drupe. There are 2 species—M. Canadense, the Canadian moonseed, native of North America, and M. Dauricum, indigenous to the temperate parts of eastern Asia. The former is a desirable arbor-vine, though its flowers are inconspicuous. Its fruit is black with a bloom, resembling small grapes.

1, flowering branch of Menispermum Canadense; 2, a deeply lobed leaf; a, the male flower; b, the female flower; c, the pistils and a stamen; d, vertical section through one of the pistils; e, the fruit.

2. [l. c.] The pharmacopœial name of the rhizome and rootlets of Menispermum Canadense. It is little used in medicine, and seems inert. Also called Texas sarsaparilla.

meniver†, n. An obsolete form of miniver.

mennard (men'ard), n. [See minnow.] A minnow. [Prov. Eng.]

mennawe†, n. An obsolete form of minnow.

Mennonist (men'ọn-ist), n. [< Mennon-ite + -ist.] Same as Mennonite.

Mennonite (men'ọn-īt), n. [< Menno (see def.) + -ite[2].] A member of a Christian denomination which originated in Friesland in the early part of the sixteenth century, and holds doctrines of which Menno Simons (1492–1559) was the chief exponent. The leading features of the Mennonite bodies have been baptism on profession of faith, refusal of oaths, of civic offices, and of the support of the state in war, and a tendency to asceticism. Many of these beliefs and practices have been modified. The sect became divided in the seventeenth century into the Upland ("Obere") Mennonites or Ammanites and the Lowland ("Untere") Mennonites, the former being the more conservative and rigorous. Members of the sect are found in the Netherlands, Germany, Russia, etc., and especially in the United States. In the last-named country they are divided into "Untere" or Old Mennonites, "Obere" Mennonites or Ammanites, New Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonites, and Reformed Mennonites (or Herrians).

mennow†, n. An obsolete form of minnow.

menobranch (men'ọ-brangk), n. An animal of the genus Menobranchus.

Menobranchidæ (men-ọ-brang'ki-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menobranchus + -idæ.] A family of amphibians named from the genus Menobranchus: same as Proteidæ.

Menobranchus (men-ọ-brang'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μένειν, remain (see remain), + βράγχια, gills.] 1. A genus of tailed amphibians of the family Proteidæ, characterized by the persistence of Menobranchus or Necturus maculatus.

the gills and the possession of four limbs with four well-developed digits. It is the American representative of the Old World genus Proteus. M. maculatus inhabits the waters of the Mississippi basin and of the Great Lakes, while M. punctatus is found in those of the south Atlantic watershed. The genus is also called Necturus.

2. [l. c.] An animal of this genus.

Menocerca (men-ọ-sėr'kạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μένειν, remain, + κέρκος, a tail.] A series of Old World catarrhine simians, from which the tailless apes (Anthropoidea) and man are by some supposed to be derived, as well as the existing tailed monkeys and baboons. Haeckel.

menocercal (men-ọ-sėr'kal), a. [< Menocerca + -al.] Of or pertaining to the Menocerca.

Menodontidæ (men-ọ-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menodus (-odont-) + -idæ.] A family of fossil perissodactyls, typified by the genus Menodus, to which are probably also referable such forms as Titanotherium of Leidy, Brontotherium of Marsh, and Symborodon of Cope.

Menodus (men'ọ-dus), n. [NL. (Pomel, 1849), < Gr. μήνη, a crescent, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of fossil perissodactyls, typical of the family Menodontidæ.

menolipsis (men-ọ-lip'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηνιαῖα, the menses), + λεῖψις, a failing.] In pathol., the failure or retention of the catamenia.

menologium (men-ọ-lō'ji-um), n. Same as menology.

menology (mē-nol′ō-ji), n. [=F. ménologe = Sp. Pg. menologio, < ML. menologium, < MGr. μηνολόγιον, a calendar of months, < Gr. μήν, a month (see month), + λόγος, an account, < λέγειν, speak, tell: see -ology.] 1. A register of months, or of occurrences in the order of the months.

menoplania (men-ō-plā′ni-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηνιαῖα, the menses), + πλάνη, a wandering, deviation.] In pathol., a discharge of blood, at the catamenial period, from some other part of the body than the womb; an aberration of the menstrual flow. Thomas, Med. Dict.

Menopoma (men-ō-pō′mạ), n. [NL., so called with ref. to its permanent gill-openings; < Gr. μένειν, remain, + πῶμα, a lid.] A genus of large tailed amphibians, typical of the family Menopomidæ: so called from the persistence of the gill-slits or branchial apertures. The genus is peculiar to America, where it represents the so-called "giant salamander" of Japan (Sieboldia, or Megalobatrachus maximus). There are two described species of these large, ugly, and repulsive creatures, M. alleghaniensis and M. fusca. They have four short but well-formed limbs, the fore feet four-toed and the hind feet five-toed. They attain a length of one or two feet, and live in muddy waters of the Alleghany region and Mississippi basin. They are voracious, may readily be taken with hook and line, and are very tenacious of life. They are the largest amphibians of America, and are wrongly reputed to be poisonous. They are popularly known by the names of hellbender, mud-devil, water-puppy, water-dog, ground puppy, and tweeg. The name Menopoma is antedated by Cryptobranchus, which has also been used for Sieboldia. The species fusca is of doubtful validity.

Menopomatidæ (men″ō-pō-mat′i-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Menopomidæ. Hogg, 1838.

menopome (men′ō-pōm), n. [< NL. Menopoma.] An animal of the genus Menopoma.

Menopomidæ (men-ō-pom′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menopoma + -idæ.] A family of tailed amphibians named from the genus Menopoma. It is composed of the two genera Menopoma (or Protonopsis) and Megalobatrachus (or Sieboldia or Cryptobranchus), and is also called Protonopsidæ and Cryptobranchidæ.

menorrhagia (men-ō-rā′ji-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηνιαῖα, menses), + -ραγία, a flowing, < ῥηγνύναι, break. Cf. hemorrhage.] 1. In physiol., ordinary menstruation. —2. In pathol., an immoderate menstrual discharge; menorrhagy.

menorrhagic (men-ō-raj′ik), a. [< menorrhagy + -ic.] Of or pertaining to menorrhagia; also, affected with menorrhagia.

menorrhagy (men′ō-rā-ji), n. Same as menorrhagia.

menorrhœa (men-ō-rē′ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, month (> μηνιαῖα, menses), + ῥοία, a flowing, < ῥεῖν, flow.] 1. In physiol., the normal menstrual flow. —2. In pathol., prolonged menstruation.

menostasis (mē-nos′tā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήν, a month (> μηνιαῖα, menses), + στάσις, a standing: see stasis.] 1. In pathol., the retention of the menses and their accumulation in the uterus; suppression or retention of the catamenial discharge. —2. The acute pain which in some women precedes each appearance of the menses: so called because it is presumed to be occasioned by stagnancy of the blood in the capillary vessels of the uterus.

menostation (men-os-tā′shon), n. [< Gr. μήν, a month (> μηνιαῖα, menses), + L. statio(n-), standing: see station.] Same as menostasis.

Menotyphla (men-ō-tif′lạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μένειν, remain, + τυφλός, blind (with ref. to the cæcum).] In some systems of classification, a division of the mammalian order Insectivora, including those forms which possess a cæcum, as distinguished from those without a cæcum, or Lipotyphla.

menotyphlic (men-ō-tif′lik), a. [< Menotyphla + -ic.] Having a cæcum; specifically, of or pertaining to the Menotyphla.

mensurabilis, that can be measured, < mensurare, measure: see mensurate, measure. Cf. measurable.] 1. Capable of being measured; measurable.

The solar month . . . is not easily mensurable. Holder.

2. In music, noting that style of music which succeeded the earliest plain-song, and was distinguished from it by such a combination of simultaneous but independent voice-parts that a system of rhythm was necessitated to avoid confusion. It involved both a classification of rhythms and the invention of a notation to represent rhythmic values. Two principal rhythms were recognized: tempus perfectum, which was triple (called "perfect" for fanciful theological reasons), and tempus imperfectum, which was duple. The system of notation included notes and rests called large, maxima, long, breve, semibreve, minim, semiminima, fusa, and semifusa (fusella), of which in general each note was equal in duration to either three or two of the next denomination, according to the tempus used. (See the various words.) The working out of the system was highly complicated, but it prepared the way for the medieval study of counterpoint and for the invention of an adequate notation, and thus contributed directly to the progress of musical art. Also mensural.

mensurableness (men′sū-ra-bl-nes), n. The quality of being mensurable; mensurability. Bailey, 1727.

mensural (men′sū-ral), a. [= Sp. Pg. mensural, < LL. mensuralis, of or belonging to measuring, < L. mensura, measuring: see measure, n.] 1. Pertaining to measure.—2. Same as mensurable, 2.—Mensural note, in musical notation, a note whose form indicates its time-value relative to other notes in the same piece, as in the ordinary modern notation.—Mensural signature. See signature and rhythmic.

mensurate (men′sū-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. mensurated, ppr. mensurating. [< LL. mensuratus, pp. of mensurare (> It. mensurare = Sp. Pg. mensurar = F. mesurer), measure, < mensura, measuring, measure: see measure, n. Cf. measure, v.] To measure; ascertain the dimensions or quantity of. [Rare.]

mensuration (men-sū-rā′shon), n. [= F. mensuration = Pr. mensuratio = Sp. mensuración, < LL. mensuratio(n-), measuring, < mensurare, measure: see mensurate, measure.] The act, art, or process of measuring; specifically, the act or art of determining length, area, volume, content, etc., by measurement and computation: as, the rules of mensuration; the mensuration of surfaces and solids.

The measure which he [the Christian] would have others mete out to himself is the standard whereby he desires to be tried in his mensurations to all other.
Bp. Hall, The Christian, § ii.

mensurative (men′sū-rā-tiv), a. [< mensurate + -ive.] Capable of measuring; adapted for measurement, or for taking the measure of things.

"Yes, Friends," observes the Professor, "not our Logical, Mensurative faculty, but our Imaginative one, is King over us." Carlyle, Sartor Resartus (ed. 1831), p. 153.

The third method spoken of may be called the mensurative. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXII. 342.

ment[1]†. An obsolete preterit of mean[1].

ment[2]†. An obsolete preterit of ming[1].

ment[3]†, v. i. A variant of mint[3].

-ment. [ME. -ment = OF. and F. -ment = Sp. -miento = Pg. mentality (men-tal′i-ti), n. [< mental + -ity.] Mental action or power; intellectual activity; intellectuality.

The "Catholic World" laments the decay of mentality in Protestant England, finding the cause of its unhappiness in the fact that the British magazine is so poor an affair as it is. . . . This is but a dangerous criterion of mentality. The Nation, Aug. 3, 1871, p. 78.

A certain amount of mentality or volition accompanied the result. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 450.

Hudibras has the same hard mentality.
Emerson, English Traits, xiv.

mentalization (men″tal-i-zā′shon), n. [< mentalize + -ation.] Operation of the mind; mental action; manner of thinking. [Rare.]

Previous to the establishment of complete delirium or delusions there may be traced deviations from healthy mentalization. E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 101.

mentalize (men′tal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mentalized, ppr. mentalizing. [< mental[1] + -ize.] To develop mentally; cultivate the mind or intellect of; excite to mental activity.

The only thing that can ever undermine our school system in popular support is a suspicion that it does not moralize as well as mentalize children. G. S. Hall, in N. A. Rev.

mentally (men′tal-i), adv. [< mental[1] + -ly[2].] Intellectually; in the mind; in thought or meditation; in idea.

There is no assignable portion of matter so minute that it may not, at least mentally (to borrow a school-term), be further divided into still lesser and lesser parts.
Boyle Works, I. 401.

mentation (men-tā′shon), n. [< L. men(t-)s, the mind, + -ation.] 1. The action or exercise of the mind or of its physical organ; mental activity; ideation; cerebration; intellection.

The most absurd mentation and most extravagant actions in insane people are the survival of their fittest states.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXV. 173.

2. The result of mentation; state of mind.

mentery† (men′te-ri), n. [< F. menterie, lying, falsehood, < mentir, < L. mentiri, lie: see mendacious.] Lying.

Loud mentery small confutation needs.
G. Harvey, Sonnets, xix.

Mentha (men′thä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. mentha, mint: see mint[2].] A genus of aromatic labiate plants, type of the family Menthaceæ, the mint family. It is characterized by 4 stamens, which are nearly equal and distant or diverging, with parallel anther-cells, and by a calyx which is 10-nerved and 5-toothed. On account of the great variability and tendency to intergrade the number of species is unsettled, but modern authors make it range from 15 to 30. They are widely distributed over the world, but are found principally in the temperate regions. They are erect diffuse herbs with opposite leaves, and flowers in dense whorls, arranged in terminal or axillary heads or spikes. The common name mint applies to all the species. See mint[2], horsemint, hillwort, pennyroyal, 1, and peppermint.

The Upper Part of Peppermint (Mentha piperita), with flowers.
a, flower; b, calyx.

menthene (men′thēn), n. [< L. mentha, mint, + -ene.] A liquid hydrocarbon ($C_{10}H_{18}$) obtained from peppermint-oil.

Menthinæ (men-thī′nē), n. pl. [NL. (Briquet, 1895), < Mentha + -inæ.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Saturejeæ. It is characterized by distant or divaricate stamens, with anthers which are 2-celled, at least when young, and by a calyx which is almost always from 10- to 13-nerved. It embraces 5 genera, of which Mentha is the type, and about 42 species. The plants are found in both hemispheres, but they are almost wholly confined to the temperate or the subtropical regions.

menthol (men′thol), n. [< L. mentha, mint, + -ol.] In chem., a solid, volatile, crystalline compound ($C_{10}H_{20}O_1$) obtained from oil of peppermint by refrigeration, by fractional distillation, and then refrigeration of the fraction containing the menthol. It has the odor of peppermint, melts at 110° F., and volatilizes unchanged at a higher temperature. It is used in medicine as a local application in neuralgia. Also called peppermint-camphor.

Menticirrus (men-ti-sir′us), n. [NL., orig. Menticirrhus (Gill, 1861), < L. mentum, the chin, + cirrus, a tuft of hair: see cirrus.] A genus of sciænoid fishes. There are about 11 species, all American, as M. nebulosus, of the Atlantic coast of the United States, where it is known as kingfish, whiting, and barb; M. Americanus, a more southern whiting of the same coast; and M. undulatus, the bagara of the Pacific coast. They are highly prized for the table. See cut under kingfish.

menticultural (men-ti-kul′tūr-al), a. [< L. men(t-)s, the mind, + cultura, culture: see culture.] Cultivating or improving the mind; educational.

mentiferous (men-tif′e-rus), a. [< L. men(t-)s, the mind, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Conveying or transferring mind or thought; telepathic: as, mentiferous ether. [Recent.]

mentigerous (men-tij′e-rus), a. [< L. mentum, the chin, + gerere, bear, carry.] In entom., bearing the mentum: as, a mentigerous process of the gula.

mention (men′shon), n. [< ME. mentioun, mencion, < OF. mention, F. mention = Sp. mención = Pg. menção = It. menzione, < L. mentio(n-), a calling to mind, a speaking, mention, akin to men(t-)s, mind, < memini (√ men, min), have in mind, remember: see mind[1].] 1. Statement about or reference to a person or thing; notice or remark; especially, assertion or statement without details or particulars.

He dide many grete dedes of armes, of whiche is yet made no mention, till that my mater com ther-to.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 124.

And sleep in dull, cold marble, where no mention
Of me more must be heard of.
Shak, Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 433.

Let us . . . speak of things at hand
Useful; whence haply mention may arise
Of something not unseasonable to ask.
Milton, P. L., viii. 200.

Now, the mention [of God's name] is vain, when it is useless. Paley, Moral Philos., iv. 2.

2. Indication; evidence. [Rare.]

It [the earthquake] brought vp the Sea a great way vpon the maine Land, which is carried backe with it into the Sea, not leauing mention that there had beene Land.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 532.

3†. Note; reputation.

'Tis true, I have been a rascal, as you are,
A fellow of no mention, nor no mark.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, v. 3.

4†. Report; account.

And wheresoever my fortunes shall conduct me,
So worthy mentions I shall render of you,
So vertuous and so fair.
Beau. and Fl., Custom of the Country, i. 1.

mention (men′shon), v. t. [< F. mentionner = Sp. Pg. mencionar = It. menzionare, < ML. mentionare, mention, < L. mentio(n-), mention: see mention, n.] To make mention of; speak of briefly or cursorily; speak of; name; refer to.

I will mention the lovingkindnesses of the Lord.
Isa. lxiii. 7.

I mention Egypt, where proud kings
Did our forefathers yoke. Milton, Psalm lxxxvii.

This road was formerly called Via Antoniana; the ascent to it is difficult, and a Latin inscription is cut on the rock, mentioning the name of the road, and that it was made by the emperor Aurelius.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 92.

mentionable (men′shon-a-bl), a. [< mention + -able.] That can or may be mentioned.

mentohyoid (men-tō-hī′oid), a. and n. [< L. mentum, the chin, + NL. hyoides, hyoid.] I. a. Pertaining to the chin and to the hyoid bone.

II. n. An occasional muscle in man, passing between the chin and the hyoid bone.

mentomeckelian (men″tō-me-kē′li-an), n. [< L. mentum, the chin, + Meckel (see def.) + -ian.] A distal division of Meckel's cartilage around which the lower jaw ossifies; in amphibian osteology, the distal division of Meckel's cartilage representing the lower jaw of the tadpole larva.

mentonnière (moṅ-ton-iãr′), n. [F., < OF. mentoniere, < menton, the chin, < L. mentum, the chin: see mentum.] 1. Same as beaver[2]. —2. A piece of armor, used on occasions of special danger as an appendage to the open helmet, worn about the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was put on outside of the gorget, secured to the helmet by hooks on each side and by a slot or similar contrivance at the umbrel, and thus replaced the vizor and beaver of the armet, except that it was not capable of being raised, but had to be removed altogether.

Mentonnière, close of 15th century.

3. An extra defense used during the just, protecting the throat and lower part of the face. [Rare.]

mentor (men′tor), n. [< L. Mentor, < Gr. Μέντωρ, Mentor (or Athena in his guise), friend and adviser of Odysseus (Ulysses) and of Telemachus; prob. 'adviser,' akin to L. monitor, adviser: see monitor.] One who acts as a wise and faithful guide and monitor, especially of a younger person; an intimate friend who is also a sage counselor, as of one who is young or inexperienced.

mentorial (men-tō′ri-al), a. [< mentor + -ial.] Containing advice or admonition.

mentum (men′tum), n.; pl. menta (-tä). [L., the chin.] 1. The chin; the anterior and inferior part of the mandible or under jaw-bone of a mammal, with or without associated soft parts. It sometimes is regarded as including the parts in the whole interramal space, or interval between the horizontal rami of the mandible.

2. In entom., the median or central and usually principal part of the labium. The term has been applied to different parts of the labium, in different insects and also in the same insect, whence confusion has arisen, especially in the use of the terms mentum and submentum. The mentum is properly the part of the labium between the submentum and the ligula, and is often less conspicuous than either of these. See labium, and cut at mouth-parts.

3. In bot., a projection in front of the flower in some orchids, caused by the extension of the foot of the column.—Levator menti. See levator.—Mentum abconditum, the retreating chin, not attaining to a perpendicular let fall from the alveolar border of the jaw; a chin with no prominence.—Mentum prominulum, the protrusive chin, extending beyond a perpendicular let fall from the alveolar border of the jaw.—Quadratus menti the depressor labii inferioris, a muscle of the chin which draws down the lower lip.—Symphysis menti, the midline of union of the two halves of the lower jaw-bone.—Tooth of the mentum. Same as mentum-tooth.—Triangularis menti, the depressor anguli oris, a muscle which draws down the corner of the mouth.

mentum-tooth (men′tum-töth), n. In entom., a small median process on the front margin of the mentum, generally within an emargination. It is found in certain Coleoptera.

Mentzelia (ment-zē′li-ä), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after C. Mentzel, a botanical author of Brandenburg in the 17th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Loasaceæ. It is distinguished by a one-celled ovary with an indefinite number of ovules, by having no scales on the corolla, and by alternate leaves. About 60 species are known, which are found in the warmer and tropical regions of America, especially in the western part. They are herbs or small shrubs, usually with rigid tenacious barbed hairs, leaves which are mostly coarsely toothed or pinnatifid, and yellow or white flowers, which are cymose or solitary.

menu (mę-nü′), n. [F., < L. minutum, neut. of minutus, small: see minute[2].] A list of the dishes served at meals, either at a private house or at a restaurant or hotel; a bill of fare.

Menura (mę-nū′rä), n. [NL., so called in ref. to the extraordinary form of the tail (which is otherwise compared to a lyre), < Gr. μήνη, the moon, + οὐρά, tail.] The typical and only known genus of Menuridæ. Three species are described: M. superba, M. victoriæ, and M. alberti, all of Australia, and two apparently valid. See cut under lyre-bird. Also written, incorrectly, Mœnura, Mœnura.

menurance†, n. See manurance.

menure†, v. t. See manure.

Menuridæ (mę-nū′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Menura + -idæ.] An Australian family of anomalous or pseudoscinine passerine birds, represented by the genus Menura; the lyre-birds. It is one of two families (the other being Atrichiidæ) which, though belonging to the order Passeres, deviate from the normal passerine type in the structure of the vocal organs and in some other particulars, to such an extent that a separate division of the order has been established for their reception. (See Menuroideæ and Pseudoscines.) The remarkable conformation of the tail of the male birds early attracted attention, and the size and general appearance of the birds caused them for many years to be considered as rasorial or gallinaceous, they being accordingly ranked with the mound-birds, curassows, and guans. Subsequently they were referred by some authors to the American family of rock-wrens (Pteroptochidæ). It is only of late years that a knowledge of the anatomical structure has enabled ornithologists to classify the family correctly.

menuroid (men′ū-roid), a. Having the characters of the Menuroideæ; pseudoscinine.

Menuroideæ (men-ū-roi′dę-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Menura + -oideæ.] A superfamily of pseudoscinine passerine birds containing the Menuridæ and Atrichiidæ, or the Australian lyre-birds and scrub-birds, characterized by the abnormal structure of the acromyodian syrinx, and the disposition of the tensor patagii brevis as in picarian birds.

menuse[1]†, v. A Middle English form of minish.

menuse[2]†, n. See menise.

Menyanthaceæ (men-i-an-thā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Don, 1837), < Menyanthes + -aceæ.] A family of plants of the order Gentianales. It is characterized by having radical or alternate leaves, and by the lobes of the corolla being induplicate-valvate in the bud. It embraces 5 genera, of which Menyanthes is the type, and about 35 species.

Menyanthes (men-i-an′thēz), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), improp. for Menianthes or Menanthes, < Gr. μηνιαῖος, or μηναῖος, monthly, or μήν, month, + ἄνθος, flower.] A genus of plants, type of the family Menyanthaceæ. It is characterized by a capsule which breaks open irregularly at the top into two partial valves, and by long petiolate radical leaves, which are trifoliate or round, reniform, and crenate. There is but a single species, M. trifoliata, the bog-bean, buck-bean, or marsh-trefoil. They are herbaceous water-plants, with a creeping rootstock, sheathed by the membranous bases of the long petioles, and bear white or bluish flowers, which grow in a raceme at the apex of a long leafless scape. See bog-bean.

menyanthin (men-i-an′thin), n. [< Menyanthes + -in[2].] A glucoside ($C_{33}H_{50}O_{14}$) obtained from Menyanthes trifoliata.

menye†, menyie†, n. Other forms of meiny.

menyng†, n. A Middle English form of meaning.

menzie (mē′nyi), n. A Scotch form of meiny.

Before all the menzie, and in her moment of power, the Queen humbled her to the dust by taxing her with her shame.

Scott, Abbot, xxxi.

Menziesia (men-zi-ē′si-ä), n. [NL. (J. E. Smith, 1806), so named after Archibald Menzies (died 1842), surgeon and naturalist to the expedition under Vancouver. The surname Menzies, prop. Menyies (the z being orig. merely another shape of y), appears to be derived from ME. menzie, i. e. menyie, var. of meinie, etc., a household: see meiny.] A genus of plants of the family Ericaceæ and the tribe Rhododendreæ. It is distinguished by the loose coat of the seeds, the short gamopetalous corolla, and the 4- to 5-celled ovary. There are 7 species, natives of North America, Japan, and Kamchatka, shrubs with alternate petioled entire deciduous leaves, and small or medium-sized flowers in terminal racemes. One species, M. pilosa, is found in the Alleghanies. The Irish heath, Dabœcia Cantabrica, was formerly included in this genus.

meoble†, a. and n. See moble[1].

meon†, n. [< Gr. μῆον, spignel: see Meum[2], mew[7].] Same as mew[7]. Minsheu.

Mephistophelean (mef″is-tō-fē′lē-an), a. [< Mephistophele-s + -an.] Same as Mephistophelian.

Wit is apt to be cold . . . and Mephistophelean in men who have no relish for humour.

George Eliot, Essays, German Wit.

Mephistopheles (mef-is-tof′e-lēz), n. [Written Mephostophilus in Shakspere, Fletcher, etc., Mephostophilis in Marlowe, but now generally Mephistopheles, as in Goethe; a made-up name, like most of the names of the medieval devils. Whether the orig. concocter of the name meant to form it from Gr. μή, not, + φῶς (φωτ-), light, + φίλος, loving (a plausible etymology, though the formation is irregular), or from some other elements (some conjecture Gr. νέφος, a cloud, + φίλος, loving), or merely concocted a Greek-seeming name of no meaning, must be left to conjecture.] The name of a familiar spirit mentioned in the old legend of Sir John Faustus, and a principal agent in Marlowe's play of Dr. Faustus, and in Goethe's "Faust."

Then he may pleasure the king, at a dead pinch too, Without a Mephostophilus, such as thou art.

Fletcher, Wife for a Month, v. 1.

Mephistopheles . . . is the Spirit of Negation, and his being exists through opposition to the positive Truth, and Order, and Beauty, which proceed from the never-ending creative energy of the Deity. . . . His irreverence and irony are . . . a part of his nature.

B. Taylor, Faust, i., note 53.

Mephistophelian (mef″is-tō-fē′liạn), a. [Also Mephistophelean; < Mephistophel-es + -ian.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling in character the spirit Mephistopheles; diabolical; sardonic; jeering; irreverent.

mephitic (mę-fit′ik), a. [= F. méphitique = Sp. mefítico = Pg. mephitico = It. mefitico, < LL. mephiticus, pestilential, < L. mephitis, a pestilential exhalation: see mephitis.] Pertaining to mephitis; foul; noxious; pestilential; poisonous; stifling.

The schools kept the thinking faculty alive and active, when the disturbed state of civil life, the mephitic atmosphere engendered by the dominant ecclesiasticism, and the almost total neglect of natural knowledge might well have stifled it. Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 195.

That strange and scarcely known lily, alas! of almost mephitic odor, the xerophyllum.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 863.

Mephitic gas†, carbon dioxid.

mephitical (mę-fit′i-kạl), a. [< mephitic + -al.] Same as mephitic.

mephitically (mę-fit′i-kạl-i), adv. [< mephitical + -ly[2].] With mephitis; foully; pestilentially.

Mephitinæ (mef-i-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mephitis + -inæ.] A subfamily of Mustelidæ peculiar to America, typified by the genus Mephitis; the skunks. The group is closely related to the badgers or Melinæ and to the African Zorillinæ, the three being combined by some authors. But the Mephitinæ are distinguished by having 2 or 4 more teeth in the lower than in the upper jaw, the back upper molar quadrate, and the premolars 3 above and below on each side (in one genus only 2 above on each side). The form is stout, with moderately developed limbs, unwebbed digits, and long bushy tail; the coloration is black and white; there is no subcaudal pouch as in badgers, but the perineal glands are enormously developed, secreting the fetid fluid which forms a means of defense and offense. The habits are terrestrial and to some extent fossorial. There are 3 genera, Mephitis, Spilogale, and Conepatus.

mephitis (mę-fī′tis), n. [< L. mephitis, a pestilential exhalation; personified, Mephitis, also Mefitis, a goddess who averts pestilential exhalations.] 1. A pestilential exhalation, especially from the earth; any noxious or ill-smelling emanation, as from putrid or filthy substances; a noisome or poisonous stench.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of skunks, typical of the subfamily Mephitinæ. The teeth are 34 in number, 16 above and 18 below. The pelage is very long, the tail long and very bushy, and the coloration black, striped or spotted with white. The palate ends opposite the last molar; the mastoid process is flaring; the periotics are not much inflated; the zygoma rises backward; and the profile of the skull is highest over the orbits. The nostrils are lateral, and the soles hairy, at least in part. There are several species, of North and Central America, the best-known of which is M. mephitica, the common skunk. M. macrura is the long-tailed skunk of Mexico. The little striped skunk, M. putorius of the United States, is referred by Coues to the genus Spilogale. The South American and African skunks which have been referred to Mephitis belong to other genera. See skunk.

mephitism (mę-fī′tizm), n. [< mephit(is) + -ism.] Same as mephitis, 1. Dunglison.

Mephostophilus†, Mephostophilist†, n. See Mephistopheles.

meracious†, (mę-rā′shus), a. [Erroneously for meracous*, < L. meracus, pure, unmixed, < merus, pure: see mere[3].] Without admixture or adulteration; pure; hence, strong; racy.

meracity† (mę-ras′i-ti), n. [< L. meracus, pure: see meracious.] Clearness or pureness. Blount, Glossographia.

meraline (mer′ạ-lin), n. A woolen material for women's dresses and cloaks, usually having a narrow stripe.

mercable† (mėr′kạ-bl), a. [< L. mercabilis, that can be bought, < mercari, trade, buy: see merchant.] Capable of being bought or sold; merchantable. Blount, Glossographia.

mercantile (mėr'kạn-til), a. [Formerly also mercantil; < OF. mercantil, F. mercantile = Sp. Pg. mercantil = It. mercantile, < ML. mercantilis, of a merchant or of trade, < L. mercan(t-)s, a merchant, trading: see merchant.] 1. Of or pertaining to merchants, or the traffic carried on by merchants; having to do with trade or commerce; trading; commercial.

Bonrepaux . . . was esteemed an adept in the mystery of mercantile politics. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. Characteristic of the business of merchants; in accord with business principles.—Mercantile law, the laws applicable to commercial transactions; the law merchant. See law merchant, under *law*1. —Mercantile system, in polit. econ., a system of political and economic policy, coincident in its evolution with the modern national state, which sought through minute regulation of commerce and industry to secure the political supremacy of a state in its rivalry with other states. The exponents of this system laid great stress upon the accumulation by a nation of an ample stock of the precious metals; and since these were to be secured chiefly through foreign trade, many of the practical measures of statesmen of this school aimed to prevent the outflow of bullion and to encourage its importation. Of these the most prominent attempted to stimulate exportation and to discourage importation, in order that the foreign trade might result in a balance to be paid in bullion. Other measures were designed to increase population and to encourage agriculture. Until the last quarter of the 19th century economists regarded the emphasis laid upon the importation of the precious metals as the essence of the system.

Thus, the Mercantile System admits every mode of applying the three factors of production, but considers them really productive only in so far as they increase the quantity of the precious metals possessed by the nation, either through the agency of mining at home or by means of foreign trade. W. Roscher, Pol. Econ. (trans.), I. 169.

=Syn. Mercantile, Commercial. Commercial is the broader term, including the other. Mercantile applies only to the actual purchase and sale of goods, according to one's line of business; the mercantile class in a community comprises all such as are actually in the business of buying and selling. Commercial covers the whole theory and practice of commerce, home or foreign: as, the British are a commercial people; commercial usages, honor, law. The word is applicable wherever the more varied activities of commerce are concerned.

mercantilism (mėr'kạn-til-izm), n. [< mercantile + -ism.] 1. The mercantile spirit or character; devotion to trade and commerce; excessive importance attached to traffic, or to exchange of values in any way.

Mercantilism is drawing into its vortex the intellectual strength of the nation. The Century, XXXI. 311.

2. In polit. econ., the mercantile system, or the theories embodied in it. See mercantile.

Indeed, it has been justly observed that there are in him [Hume] several traces of a refined mercantilism, and that he represents a state of opinion in which the transition from the old to the new views is not yet completely effected. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 364.

mercantilist (mėr'kạn-til-ist), n. [< mercantile + -ist.] 1. A devotee of mercantilism; a believer in the supreme importance of trade and commerce.—2. In polit. econ., an advocate of the mercantile system, or of some similar theory.

The mercantilists may be best described, as Roscher has remarked, not by any definite economic theorem which they held in common, but by a set of theoretic tendencies, commonly found in combination, though severally prevailing in different degrees in different minds.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 354.

mercantilistic (mėr″kạn-ti-lis'tik), a. [< mercantilist + -ic.] Pertaining to mercantilism, or to the mercantile system in political economy; characteristic of mercantilists.

From the seventeenth century mercantilistic views began to exercise a more and more marked influence upon financial literature. Cyc. of Pol. Science, II. 197.

mercantility (mėr-kạn-til'i-ti), n. [< mercantile + -ity.] Mercantile spirit or enterprise. [Rare.]

mercaptan (mėr-kap'tạn), n. [So called as absorbing mercury; < L. Mer(curius), Mercury, ML., quicksilver, mercury, + captan(t-)s, taking, ppr. of captare, take: see captation.] One of a class of compounds analogous to alcohols, in which the group SH takes the place of hydroxyl. They are all liquids having an offensive garlic odor, and form with mercuric oxid white crystalline compounds, hence their name. Methyl mercaptan (CH_3SH) or methyl sulphydrate, is a highly offensive gas (liquid below 6° C.)

mercaptide (mėr-kap'tid or -tīd), n. [< mercaptan + *-ide*1.] A compound formed by the union of mercaptan with a metallic base.

mercaptoic (mėr-kap-tō'ik), a. [< mercapt(an) + -o-ic.] Derived from or having the properties of mercaptans.

mercat†, mercate†, n. [< It. mercato, < L. mercatus, a market: see market.] Same as market.

This was formerly the Circus or Agonales, dedicated to sports and pastimes, and is now the greatest mercat of ye citty. Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 20, 1645.

By order of court a mercate was erected at Boston, to be kept upon Thursday, the fifth day of the week.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 148.

mercatante† (mer-ka-tan'te), n. [< It. mercatante (cf. Sp. mercadante = OF. mercadant, < It.) (equiv. to mercante), a merchant, < mercatare, trade, < mercato, trading, market: see market, v.] A foreign trader.

Tra. What is he, Biondello?
Bion. Master, a mercatante, or a pedant,

A maner dewe dette for the doynge;
And bote if yt be payed prestliche the payer is to blame.
Piers Plowman (C), iv. 306.

Mercedonius, Mercedinus (mėr-se-dō'ni-us, -dī'nus), n. [L.] In the Roman calendar commonly ascribed to Numa Pompilius, second king of Rome, an intercalary month inserted every second year between the 23d and the 24th of February, and having twenty-two or twenty-three days.

mercement† (mėrs'mẹnt), n. [ME., also merciment, mercyment; by apheresis from amercement. Cf. merciament.] A fine; a penalty satisfied by a money-payment; a mulct.

Brynge alle men to bowe with-oute byter wounde,
With-oute mercement other manslauht amenden alle reames. Piers Plowman (C), v. 182.

Rigt so is loue a ledere and the lawe shapeth,
Vpon man for his mysdedes the merciment he taxeth.
Piers Plowman (B), i. 160.

mercenarian† (mėr-se-nā'ri-ạn), n. [< mercenary + -an.] A mercenary.

Odd bands
Of voluntaries and mercenarians.
Marston, In Praise of Pygmalion, l. 18.

mercenarily (mėr'se-nā-ri-li), adv. [< mercenary + *-ly*2.] In a mercenary manner. Imp. Dict.

mercenariness (mėr'se-nā-ri-nes), n. [< mercenary + -ness.] The character of being mercenary; venality; regard to hire or reward; action or conduct uniformly prompted by the love of gain or the acquisition of money as a chief end.

mercenary (mėr'se-nā-ri), a. and n. [< ME. mercenarie = F mercenaire = Sp. Pg. It. mercenario, < L. mercenarius, earlier mercennarius, hired for pay hireling, as noun a hired laborer, < merces (merced-), pay, wages, reward: see mercy.] I. a. 1. Working or acting for reward; hired; serving only for gain; selling one's services to the highest bidder.

Mercenary men, which get their living by the trade of rowing. Coryat, Crudities, I. 214.

Mercenary troops, . . . perfectly acquainted with every part of their profession, irresistible in the field, powerful to defend or destroy, but defending without love and without hatred. Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

Hence—2. Venal; sordid; actuated only by hope of reward; ready to accept dishonorable gain: as, a mercenary prince or judge; a mercenary disposition.

This study fits a mercenary drudge.
Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, i. 1.

You know me too proud to stoop to mercenary insincerity. Goldsmith, To Edward Mills.

3. Pertaining or due to hope of gain or reward; done, given, etc., in return for hire; resulting from sordid motives: as, mercenary services; a mercenary act.

For many of our princes, woe the while,
Lie drown'd and soak'd in mercenary blood.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 7. 79.

Thus needy wits a vile revenue made,
And verse became a mercenary trade.
Dryden and Soame, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry, iv.

One act that from a thankful heart proceeds Excels ten thousand mercenary deeds.
Cowper, Truth, l. 224.

=Syn. Hireling, etc. See venal.

II. n.; pl. mercenaries (-riz). 1. A person who works for pay; especially, one who has no higher motive to work than love of gain.

He was a schepherde and no mercenarie.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 514.

Stationed by, as waiting a result,
Lean silent gangs of mercenaries ceased Working to watch the strangers.
Browning, Sordello.

2. Specifically, a soldier in foreign service; a professional soldier. This term became common during the long wars of the years immediately following the middle ages, when professional soldiers who served any one who would pay them were contrasted with those who still followed their feudal superiors.

This is to show, both how tyranny grows to stand in need of mercenary soldiers, and how those mercenaries are . . . firmly assured unto the tyrant.
Raleigh, Hist. World, V. ii. 2.

Like mercenaries, hired for home defence,
They will not serve against their native Prince.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, ii. 290.

The Chief Citizens, like the noble Italians, hire Mercenaries to carry arms in their stead. Steele, Tatler, No. 28.

mercer (mėr'sėr), n. [< ME. mercer, meercere, < OF. mercier, F. mercier = Pr. mercer, mercier = Sp. mercero = Pg. mercieiro = It. merciajo, < ML. merciarius (also mercerius, mercerus, after OF.), a trader, a dealer in small wares, < L. merx (merc-), merchandise: see mercy, merchant.] 1. A dealer in small wares, or in merchandise of any sort.

A row of pins, arranged as neatly as in the papers sold at the mercers'.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 539.

2. A dealer in cloths of different sorts, especially silk. [Eng.]

She feels not how the land drops away, nor the acres melt; nor foresees the change, when the mercer has your woods for her velvets. B. Jonson, Epicœne, ii. 1.

★mercerization (mėr″sėr-i-zā'shọn), n. [< mercerize + -ation.] A process of treating cotton fiber or fabrics, invented by John Mercer, a Lancashire calico-printer, and patented in 1850. He discovered that the steeping of cotton cloth from ten to twenty minutes in caustic and syrupy potash lye, and then washing out the cloth with alcohol of specific gravity 0.825, caused the texture to contract one tenth on drying, retaining 14.72 per cent. of potash. If soda lye of specific gravity 1.342 is substituted for the potash, the cloth shrinks one fourth and contains 9.68 per cent. of soda. Water abstracts all the soda, and leaves the shrunken tissue, which takes more brilliant colors in dyeing than unmercerized calico. Also spelled mercerisation.

mercerize (mėr'sėr-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mercerized, ppr. mercerizing. [< Mercer (see def. of mercerization) + -ize.] To treat (cotton fiber or fabrics) with a solution of caustic alkali according to the method of mercerization. Also spelled mercerise.

The microscopical examination of a mercerized cotton fiber shows it to have lost all its original characteristics.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 241.

mercership (mėr'sėr-ship), n. [< mercer + -ship.] The occupation or business of a mercer.

He confesses himself to be an egregious fool to leave his mercership, and go to be a musqueteer.
Howell, Letters, ii. 62.

mercery (mėr'sėr-i), n.; pl. merceries (-iz). [< ME. mercery, meercery, mercerie, < OF. mercerie, mercierie, F. mercerie (> Sp. mercería = Pg. It. merceria), < ML. merciaria (also mercaria, after OF.), the trade of a mercer, mercers' wares, < merciarius, a mercer: see mercer.] 1. The class of commodities or goods in which a mercer deals, as silks, woolen cloths, etc. [Eng.]

Clothe, furres, and other mercery.
Berners, tr. of Froissart's Chron., I. ccccliii.

Half the shop was appropriated to grocery; the other half to drapery, and a little mercery.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, iii.

Serious-faced folk who buy their merceries economically and seldom. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIII. 75.

2. The trade of a mercer.

merchandise (mėr'chạn-dīz), n. [Also merchandize; < ME. merchandyse, marchaundise, marchaundyse, < OF. marchandise, marchaundise, F. marchandise, a merchant's wares, < marchand, a merchant: see merchant.] 1. In general, any movable object of trade or traffic; that which is passed from hand to hand by purchase and sale; specifically, the objects of commerce; a commercial commodity or commercial commodities in general; the staple of a mercantile business; commodities, goods, or wares bought and sold for gain. Real property, ships, money, stocks, and bonds are not merchandise, nor are notes or other mere representatives or measures of actual commodities or values. [Now never used in the plural.]

Thou shalt not sell her at all for money; thou shalt not make merchandise of her. Deut. xxi. 14.

Men comen azen be Damasce, that is a fulle fayre Cytee, and fulle noble, and fulle of alle Merchandises.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 122.

As many alnagers to alner and measure al kinds of marchandises which they shal buy or sel by the yard.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 210.

2†. Purchase and sale; trade; bargain; traffic; dealing, or advantage from dealing.

I wolde make a marchaundyse
Youre myscheffe to marre. York Plays, p. 228.

For the merchandise of it [wisdom] is better than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. Prov. iii. 14.

Were he out of Venice, I can make what merchandise I will. Shak., M. of V., iii. 1. 134.

If he pay thee to the utmost farthing, thou hast forgiven nothing; it is merchandise, and not forgiveness, to restore him that does as much as you can require.
Jer. Taylor.

Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 5, 1657.

merchandizer† (mėr'chan-dī-zėr), n. A dealer in merchandise; a merchant; a trafficker; a trader.

That which did not a little amuse the merchandizers.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i.

merchandizing† (mėr'chan-dī-zing), n. Mercantile business.

When I went Home, my antient Father began to press me earnestly to enter into some Course of Life that might make some Addition to what I had; and after long Consultation Merchandizing was what I took to.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 348.

merchandry†, n. An obsolete variant of merchantry.

merchant (mėr'chant), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also merchaunt, marchant, marchaunt, marchand; < ME. marchant, marchaunt, marchand, < AF. marchant, marchaunt, OF. marchant, marcheant, marceant, F. marchand = Sp. merchante = It. mercante, a trader, merchant, < L. mercan(t-)s, a buyer, ppr. of mercari, trade, traffic, buy, < merx (merc-), merchandise, traffic, < merere, mereri, gain, buy, purchase, also deserve, merit: see mercy and merit. Etymologically the adj. precedes the noun; but the noun appears to be earlier in E.] I. n. 1. One who is engaged in the business of buying commercial commodities and selling them again for the sake of profit; especially, one who buys and sells in quantity or by wholesale. One who buys without selling again, or who sells without having bought, as where one sells products of his own labor, or who buys and sells exclusively articles not the subject of ordinary commerce, or who buys and sells commercial articles on salary and not for profit, is not usually termed a merchant. Those who buy or sell on a commission for others are termed commission-merchants. In the law of bankruptcy, which forbids a discharge to merchants and traders who have not kept proper books of account, the term has a more extended meaning, having been held to include a livery-stable keeper who buys hay and grain and indirectly sells it by boarding horses, but not a broker who speculates in stocks.

Thidre comethe Marchauntes with Marchandise be See, from Yndee, Persee, Caldee, Ermonye, and of many othere Kyngdomes. Mandeville, Travels, p. 122.

Ye merchauntes that vse the trade of merchandise,
Vse lawfull wares and reasonable prise.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 354.

A merchant of or in an article is one who buys and sells it, and not the manufacturer selling it. A wine grower is not a wine merchant; even a wine importer is not called a wine merchant, but a wine importer.
Lord Bramwell, Law Rep., 7 Ex. 127.

Here shall be his Belgravia for his grandees, and this his Cheapside and his Lombard Street for the merchants and bankers. A. Trollope, South Africa, II. 69.

2†. A supercargo; the person in charge of the business affairs of a trading expedition.

He anchored in the road with one ship of small burden; and, pretending the death of his merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might bury their merchant in hallowed ground.
Raleigh (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 16).

3†. A merchant ship or vessel; a merchantman.

The masters of some merchant. Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 5.

Convoy ships accompany their merchants till they may prosecute the rest of their voyage without danger.

2. Pertaining to merchants; belonging to the mercantile class; engaged or used in trade or commerce.

Up amang the merchant geir [merchandise],
They were as busy as we were down.
Raid of the Reidswire (Child's Ballads, VI. 136).

Merchant Adventurers. See adventurer.—Merchant bar, merchant iron, an iron bar which has been finished by passing through the merchant rolls. Puddled bars (see puddle) are worked into merchant iron or merchant bar by being cut into pieces of suitable length, which are then piled in packets, heated to a welding-heat, and then hammered and rolled, or rolled without hammering, into bars of suitable shape to be put upon the market. The amount of labor bestowed on this process depends on the quality of the iron it is desired to produce. Puddled bars which have been rolled a second time are called "No. 2," and this is what is usually designated as merchant bar. It is the lowest quality of iron available for the general smith's use. If piled and rolled again, the product is called "No. 3." Another repetition of the process furnishes an article known as "best-best," and still another gives "treble-best."—Merchant captain or seaman, a captain or seaman employed in the merchant service.—Merchant prince, a merchant of great wealth.

Many of the merchant-princes of Lombard Street and Cornhill. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xv.

The other patient, on the contrary, showed no signs of mercurialism whatever. Lancet, No. 3447, p. 609.

mercurialist (mėr-kū'ri-ạl-ist), n. [< mercurial + -ist.] 1. One who is under the influence of the planet Mercury, or one resembling the god Mercury in fickleness of character.

Mercurialists are solitary, much in contemplation, subtile. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 190.

2. A physician much given to the use of mercury in the treatment of disease. Dunglison.—3†. A scholar; a rhetorician.

He who with a deepe insight marketh the nature of our Mercurialists shall find as fit a harbour for pride under a schollers cap as under a souldiers helmet.
Greene, Farewell to Follie.

mercurialization (mėr-kū″ri-ạl-i-zā'shọn), n. [< mercurialize + -ation.] The act of mercurializing, or the state of being mercurialized. Also spelled mercurialisation.

Premature delivery appeared to follow the mercurialization of the system.
A. S. Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 448.

mercurialize (mėr-kū'ri-ạl-īz), v.; pret. and pp. mercurialized, ppr. mercurializing. [< mercurial + -ize.] I. intrans. To be capricious or fantastic.

II. trans. 1. To treat or impregnate with mercury, as by exposure to its vapor, or immersion in a chemical solution of it. To mercurialize a photographic negative is to subject it to the action of a solution of bichlorid of mercury in order to intensify or reinforce the image. Plugs of mercurialized carbon are sometimes used in microphones and in the transmitter of a telephonic circuit.

2. In med., to affect with mercury, as the bodily system; bring under the influence of mercury.

Also spelled mercurialise.

mercurially (mėr-kū'ri-ạl-i), adv. 1. In a mercurial manner.—2. By means of mercury.

Mercurian (mėr-kū'ri-ạn), a. [< L. Mercurius, Mercury, + -an.] 1. Pertaining to Mercury as god of eloquence.

The mercurian heavenly charme of hys rhetorique.
Nash, Haue with you to Saffron-Walden.

2. Pertaining to the planet Mercury.

Absorption by a Mercurian atmosphere.
A. M. Clarke, Astron. in 19th Cent.

★mercuric (mėr-kū'rik), a. [< mercur-y + -ic.] 1. Related to or containing mercury.—2. In chem., specifically applied to compounds in which each atom of mercury is regarded as bivalent: as, mercuric chlorid, $HgCl_2$.—Mercuric chlorid, corrosive sublimate.—Mercuric fulminate, fulminating mercury; a detonating compound ($HgC_2N_2O_2$) which crystallizes in shining gray crystals, prepared from a mixture of alcohol, nitric acid, and mercury nitrate. A moderate blow or slight friction causes it to explode violently. It is used for charging percussion-caps and detonating caps for firing dynamite, etc.

mercurification (mėr-kū″ri-fi-kā'shọn), n. [< mercurify + -ation: see -fication.] 1. In chem., the process or operation of obtaining the mercury from metallic minerals in its fluid form.—2. The act or art of mixing with quicksilver.

It remains that I perform the promise I made of adding the ways of mercurification. Boyle, Works, I. 643.

mercurify (mėr-kū'ri-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. mercurified, ppr. mercurifying. [< mercury + -fy.] 1. To obtain mercury from (metallic minerals), as by the application of intense heat, which expels the mercury in fumes that are afterward condensed.—2. To combine or mingle with mercury; mercurialize.

A part only of the metal is mercurified.
Boyle, Works, I. 641.

mercuriousness† (mėr-kū'ri-us-nes), n. [< mercurious* (< L. Mercurius, Mercury) + -ness.] The state or quality of being mercurial, or like the god Mercury, as (in the quotation) in his character of a swift messenger.

A chapeau with wings, to denote the mercuriousnesse of this messenger. Fuller, Worthies, Kent.

mercurism† (mėr'kū-rizm), n. [< Mercur-y + -ism.] A communication of news or intelligence; a communication or announcement. Sir T. Browne.

mercurous (mėr'kū-rus), a. [< mercur-y + -ous.] 1. Related to or containing mercury.—2. In chem., specifically applied to compounds in which two atoms of mercury are regarded as forming a bivalent radical: as, mercurous chlorid, Hg_2Cl_2.

★Mercury (mėr'kū-ri), n. [< ME. Mercurie, mercurie, < AF. Mercurie, OF. Mercure, F. Mercure = Sp. Pg. It. Mercurio, < L. Mercurius, Mercury (the deity and the planet), so called (appar.) as the god of trade, < merx (merc-), merchandise, wares: see mercy, merchant.] 1. In Rom. myth., the name of a Roman divinity, who became identified with the Greek Hermes. He was the son of Jupiter and Maia, and was the herald and ambassador of Jupiter. As a god of darkness, Mercury is the tutelary deity of thieves and tricksters; he became also the protector of herdsmen, and the god of science, commerce, and the arts and graces of life, and the patron of travelers and athletes. It was he who guided the shades of the dead to their final abiding-place. He is represented in art as a young man, usually wearing a winged hat and the talaria or winged sandals, and bearing the caduceus or pastoral staff and often a purse.

Mercury.—Statue of Greek workmanship, in the British Museum, London.

The herald Mercury,
New-lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 58.

2. [l. c. or cap.] Pl. mercuries (-riz). One who acts like the god Mercury in his capacity of a messenger; a conveyor of news or information; an intelligencer.

Following the mirror of all Christian kings,
With winged heels, as English Mercuries.
Shak., Hen. V., ii., chorus, 7.

We give the winds wings, and the angels too, as being the swift messengers of God, the nimble mercuries of heaven. Abp. Sancroft, Sermons, p. 131.

Hence—3. [l. c. or cap.] A common name for a newspaper or periodical publication; formerly, also, a newspaper-carrier or a seller of newspapers.

Those who sell them [news-books] by wholesale from the press are called mercuries. Cowell.

No allusion to it is to be found in the monthly Mercuries. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xii.

4†. [l. c.] Warmth or liveliness of temperament; spirit; sprightly qualities; hence, liability to change; fickleness.

He was so full of mercury that he could not fix long in any friendship, or to any design. Bp. Burnet.

5. The innermost planet of the solar system. Its mean distance from the sun is 0.387 that of the earth. The inclination (7 degrees) and the eccentricity (0.2056) of its orbit are exceeded only by some of the minor planets. Its diameter is only 3,000 miles, or about $\frac{3}{8}$ of that of the earth; its volume is to that of the earth as 1 to 18.5. It performs its sidereal revolution in 88 days, its synodical in 116. Its proximity to the sun prevents its being often seen with the naked eye. The mass of Mercury, though as yet not very precisely determined, is less than that of any other planet (asteroids excepted). According to Schiaparelli it rotates on its axis in the same way as the moon does, once in each orbital revolution.

6. [l. c.] Chemical symbol, Hg; atomic weight, 200. A metal of a silver-white color and brilliant metallic luster, unique in that it is fluid at ordinary temperatures. It becomes solid, or freezes, at about −39° C., and crystallizes in the isometric system. Its specific gravity at 0° is 13.6; when frozen, according to J. W. Mallet, 14.1932. This metal occurs native, sometimes in considerable quantity; but by far the largest supply is obtained from the sulphid, known as cinnabar. (See cinnabar.) Mercury is not very generally disseminated. In the United States only traces of its ores have been found to the east of the Cordilleras. The principal sources of supply are the mines of Almaden in Spain, of New Almaden and others in the State of California, and of Idria in Austria. Its chief use is in the metallurgic treatment of gold and silver ores by amalgamation. The thermometer and barometer are instruments in which the peculiar qualities of this metal are well illustrated. Commercially the most important salts of mercury are mercurous chlorid (Hg_2Cl_2) or calomel, chiefly used in medicine, and the mercuric chlorid ($HgCl_2$) or corrosive sublimate, a violent poison used in medicine and extensively in surgery as an antiseptic, and as a preservative in dressing skins, etc., being a very powerful antiseptic. The sulphid (HgS), or cinnabar, when prepared artificially, is called vermilion, and is used as a pigment. The names mercury and quicksilver are entirely synonymous, but the former is rather a scientific designation, and one necessarily used in compound names and in the adjective form; while the latter is a common popular designation of this metal. See amalgam, calomel, quicksilver.

7. [l. c.] The column of quicksilver in a thermometer or barometer, especially with reference to the temperature or state of the atmosphere shown by it. [Colloq.]

Whatever may be the height of the mercury [in the barometer], a sudden and rapid fall is a sure sign of foul weather. R. Strachan, in Modern Meteorology, p. 80.

8. [l. c.] (a) A plant of the genus Mercurialis, chiefly M. perennis, the dog's-mercury, locally called Kentish balsam (which see, under Kentish), and M. annua, the annual or French mercury. See Mercurialis. (b) In older usage, the Chenopodium Bonus-Henricus. See allgood and good-King-Henry. This is the English, false, or wild mercury.—9. In her., the tincture purple, when blazoning is done by the planets.—Argental mercury. See argental.—Baron's mercury [prob. orig. barren mercury*], the male plant of Mercurialis perennis.—Boy's mercury, the female plant of Mercurialis annua (the sexes having been mistaken).—Corneous mercury. Same as calomel.—Extinction of mercury. See extinction.—Girl's mercury, the male plant of Mercurialis annua. See male[1], 2.—Golden mercury, Mercurialis perennis, var. aurea.—Hydrosublimate of mercury, a trade-name for calomel prepared by condensing the vapor of mercurous chlorid with steam in a large receiver, which causes it to deposit in an impalpable powder absolutely free from any trace of corrosive sublimate.—Mercury agometer. See agometer.—Mercury air-pump, an apparatus used for producing a vacuum, consisting essentially of a reservoir above from which mercury flows down through a small vertical tube, the vessel to be exhausted being attached at the side (at C in the figure) at a height something more than 30 inches above the lower receptacle. The descending drops of mercury carry with them portions of the air or other gas from the receiver, and if the process is long continued, the supply vessel at the top being kept full, a nearly perfect vacuum may be obtained. This form of air-pump is often called a Sprengel pump. It gives a much higher degree of exhaustion than is possible with the ordinary mechanical air-pump, and is much used not only in physical experiments but also for practical purposes, for example in removing the air from the glass bulbs of the incandescent electric lamps.—Mount of Mercury, in palmistry. See mount[1], 5.—Native or virgin mercury, the pure metal found in the form of globules in cavities of the ores of this metal.—Three-seeded mercury, a plant of the genus Acalypha, of the same family as Mercurialis, and more or less similar in appearance. The fruit splits into three two-valved one-seeded nutlets. It is a large genus, chiefly tropical or subtropical. Many of the species are shrubby; a few (mostly herbaceous) are found in the United States.—Transit of Mercury, a passage of Mercury over the disk of the sun.—Vegetable mercury, a Brazilian plant, Franciscea uniflora, also called manaca. See Franciscea.

Mercury Air-pump.
The letter C marks the point where the vessel to be exhausted is attached.

mercury† (mėr'kū-ri), v. t. [< mercury, n.] To wash with a preparation of mercury.

They are as tender as . . . a lady's face new mercuried. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, i. 1.

mercury-cup (mėr'kū-ri-kup), n. 1. The cistern of a mercury barometer, which is filled with mercury and in which the lower end of the barometer-tube is inserted.—2. A small open cup containing mercury, used in electrical instruments and apparatus as a connection for conductors. The cup may be of conducting material and connected with one end of the wire forming the circuit, in which case the circuit will be closed by inserting the other end of the wire in the mercury; or the cup may be of non-conducting material, in which case both ends of the wire must be inserted in the mercury to close the circuit.

mercury-furnace (mėr'kū-ri-fėr″nās), n. A furnace in which cinnabar is roasted in order to cause the pure mercury to pass off in fumes, which are condensed in a series of vessels.

mercury-gatherer (mėr'kū-ri-gaᴛʜ″ėr-ėr), n. In metal-working, a stirring apparatus which causes quicksilver that has become floured or mixed with sulphur in amalgamating to resume the fluid condition, through the agency of mechanical agitation and rubbing. E. H. Knight.

mercury-goosefoot (mėr'kū-ri-gös'fůt), n. Same as mercury, 8 (b).

mercury-holder (mėr'kū-ri-hōl″dėr), n. A vulcanite cup, with a cover, used by dentists in preparing amalgam.

Mercury's-violet (mėr'kū-riz-vī″ō-let), n. The common canterbury-bell, Campanula Medium.

mercy (mėr'si), n.; pl. mercies (-siz). [< ME. mercy, mercye, mersye, marsi, merci, < OF. merci, mercit, F. merci = Pr. merce = Sp. merced = Pg. It. merce, grace, thanks, mercy, pity, pardon, < L. merces (merced-), pay, reward, also bribe, price, detriment, condition, income, etc., ML. also thanks, grace, mercy, pity, pardon, < merx (merc-), merchandise, < mererе, mereri, gain, acquire, buy, also deserve, orig. 'receive as a share': see merit. Cf. amerce, gramercy.] 1. Pitying forbearance or forgiveness; compassionate leniency toward enemies or wrong-doers; the disposition to treat offenders kindly or tenderly; the exercise of clemency in favor of an offender.

A man witheout marsi no marsi shall have
In tyme of ned when he dothe it crave.
MS. Ashmole 46. (Halliwell.)

The Lord is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty. Num. xiv. 18.

A woman's mercy is very little,
But a man's mercy is more.
Sir Hugh, or the Jew's Daughter (Child's Ballads, III. 334).

The sentiment of mercy is the natural recoil which the laws of the universe provide to protect mankind from destruction by savage passions. Emerson, John Brown.

2. An act or exercise of forbearance, good will, or favor; also, a kindness undeserved or unexpected; a fortunate or providential circumstance; a blessing: as, it is a mercy that they escaped.

I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies . . . which thou hast shewed unto thy servant. Gen. xxxii. 10.

E'en a judgment, making way for thee,
Seems in their eyes a mercy for thy sake.
Cowper, Task, ii. 132.

3. Pity; compassion; benevolence: as, a work of mercy.

In coueitise lyued haue y,
And neuere dide werkis of mercyes.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

Which now of these three . . . was neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves? And he said, He that shewed mercy on him. Luke x. 36, 37.

4. Discretionary action; unrestrained exercise of the will and the power to punish and to spare: as, to be at one's mercy (that is, wholly in one's power).

At length, vpon their submission, the king tooke them to mercie, vpon their fine, which was seized at twentie thousand marks. Holinshed, Hen. III., an. 1265.

And the offender's life lies in the mercy
Of the duke only. Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 355.

Last, 'bout thy stiff neck we this halter hang,
And leave thee to the mercy of the court.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, v. 2.

A lover is ever complaining of cruelty while anything is denied him; and when the lady ceases to be cruel, she is, from the next moment, at his mercy. Swift.

Covenanted mercies. See covenant.—Fathers of Mercy, the name of a society of Roman Catholic missionary priests, founded in France in 1806 and introduced into the United States in 1842.—For mercy! for mercy's sake! an exclamation, usually an appeal to pity.

Fer. Myself am Naples;
Who with mine eyes, never since at ebb, beheld
The king my father wreck'd.
Mir. Alack, for mercy!
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 437.

God-a-mercy†. See God[1].—Great mercy†. [Imitated from gramercy, ME. grant mercy. See gramercy.] Great favor.

Great mercy, sure, for to enlarge a thrall
Whose freedom shall thee turne to greatest scath!
Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 18.

Sisters of Mercy. See sisterhood.—Spiritual and corporal works of mercy. In the middle ages, seven great works of mercy were enumerated called the spiritual and as many called the corporal works of mercy. The seven works of corporal mercy are to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, clothe the naked, visit prisoners, visit the sick, harbor strangers, bury the dead; of spiritual mercy, to convert sinners, instruct the ignorant, counsel the doubtful, console the afflicted, bear wrongs patiently, forgive injuries, pray for the living and the dead. Cath. Dict.

In fulfillynge of Godis commandmentis and of the seven dedis of mercy bodili and gostly to a manys euen cristen.
Rolle, quoted in Hampole's Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), [Pref., p. xi.

To cry (one) mercy. (a) See cry, v. (b) To proclaim a tax.

Bot Athelstan the maistrie wan and did tham mercie crie, & alle Northwales he sat to treuage hie.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 28.

=Syn. 1. Clemency, etc. See leniency.

mercy†, v. t. [< ME. mercien, < OF. mercier, thank, also fine, < merci, thank, mercy, fine: see mercy, n., and cf. merce, amerce.] 1. To thank.

Mildeliche thenne Meede merciede hem alle
Of heore grete goodnesse. Piers Plowman (A), iii. 21.

2. To fine; amerce.

Forsters did somoun, enquered vp & doun
Whilk men of toun had taken his venysoun, & who that was gilty thorgh the foresters sawe, Merceid was full hi. Rob. of Brunne, p. 112.

mercy-seat (mėr'si-sēt), n. The place of mercy or forgiveness; the propitiatory; specifically, the covering of the ark of the covenant among the Jews. This was of gold, surmounted at each end by a cherub with outstretched wings. On this covering the blood of the yearly atonement was sprinkled, and from this place God gave his oracles to Moses or to the high priest. Hence, to approach the mercy-seat is to draw near to God in prayer.

mercy-stock†, n. A propitiation.

Our Saviour, our Ransom, our Spokesman, our Mercy-stock. Hutchinson, Works, p. 192. (Davies.) mercy-stroke (mėr'si-strōk), n. The death-stroke, as putting an end to pain; the coup de grâce.

merd† (mėrd), n. [Also mard; < OF. (and F.) merde = Pr. merga = Sp. mierda = Pg. It. merda, < L. merda, dung, ordure.] Ordure; dung; excrement.

If after thou of garlike stronge
The savour wilt expell,
A mard is sure the onely meane
To put away the smell.
Kendall's Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

Haire o' th' head, burnt clouts, chalk, merds, and clay.
B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

Merdivoræ (mėr-div'ō-rē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of merdivorus: see merdivorous.] A group of dipterous insects which feed upon dung.

merdivorous (mėr-div'ō-rus), a. [< NL. merdivorus, < L. merda, dung, + vorare, devour.] Feeding upon excrement; devouring dung.

mere[1] (mēr), n. [Formerly also meer, meere, mear; < ME. mere, meere, < AS. mere, a lake, pool, the sea, = OS. merī, a lake, = OFries. mar, a ditch, = MD. mare, maer, D. meer, meir = OHG. marī, mari, merī, meri, MHG. mer, G. meer = Icel. marr = Goth. marei, a lake; = W. mōr = Gael. Skt. maru, desert, < √ mar, die: see mort[1], mortal. Hence in comp. mermaid, merman, etc.; and ult. deriv. marsh, marish.] A pool; a small lake or pond. [Not used in the U. S., except artificially in some local names, in imitation of British names: as, Harlem mere in Central Park in New York.]

Then he wendez his way, wepande for care,
Towarde the mere of Mambre, wepande for sorewe.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 778.

As two Fishes, cast into a Meer,
With fruitful Spawn will furnish in few yeer
A Town with victuall.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Colonies.

On the edge of the mere the Prince of Orange had already ordered a cluster of forts to be erected.
Motley, Dutch Republic, II. 431.

mere[2] (mēr), n. [Formerly also meer, meere, mear, meare; < ME. meer, mere, < AS. gemære = D. meer, a limit, boundary, = Icel. mærr, border-land.] 1. A boundary; boundary-line.

The furious Team, that on the Cambrian side
Doth Shropshire as a meare from Hereford divide.
Drayton, Polyolbion. (Nares.)

As it were, a common mear between lands.
Abp. Ussher, Ans. to Malone, p. 309.

2. A balk or furrow serving as a boundary- or dividing-line in a common field; also, a boundary-stone; a merestone. [Obsolete or provincial.]—3. A private carriage-road. [North. Eng.]—4. A measure of 29 or 31 yards in the Peak of Derbyshire in England. It is defined by Blount as "29 yards in the low Peak of Derbyshire and 31 in the high." Mining claims were measured by meres, the discoverer of a lode being allowed to claim two meres.

mere[2]† (mēr), v. [Also meer, mear, etc.; < mere[2], n.] I. trans. To limit; bound; divide or cause division in.

That brave honour of the Latine name,
Which mear'd her rule with Africa and Byze.
Spenser, Ruins of Rome, st. 22.

At such a point,
When half to half the world opposed, he being
The meered question. Shak., A. and C., iii. 13. 10.

II. intrans. To set divisions and bounds.

For bounding and mearing, to him that will keepe it justely, it is a bond that brideleth power and desire.
North's Pl., L 55. D. (Nares.) mere[3] (mēr), a. [Early mod. E. also meer, meere; = OF. mer, mier = Pr. mer, mier = Sp. Pg. It. mero, < L. merus, pure, unmixed (as wine), hence bare, only, mere.] 1. Pure; sheer; unmixed.

For neither can he fly, nor other harme,
But trust unto his strength and manhood meare.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 34.

The most part of them are degenerated and growen almost meere Irish. Spenser, State of Ireland.

Our wine is here mingled with water and with myrrh; there [in the world to come] it is mere and unmixed.
Jer. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

2†. Absolute; unqualified; utter; whole; in the fullest sense.

Those who, being in mere misery, continually do call on God. Munday (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 204).

Certain tidings now arrived, importing the mere perdition of the Turkish fleet. Shak., Othello, ii. 2. 3.

Signor Francisco, whose mere object now
Is woman at these years, that's the eye-saint, I know, Amongst young gallants. Middleton, The Widow, v. 1.

Although there is such plenty of fish and fowle and wild beasts, yet are they so lasie they will not take paines to catch it till meere hunger constraine them.
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 228.

3. Sheer; simple; nothing but (the thing mentioned); only: as, it is mere folly to do so; this is the merest trash.

'Tis a mere toy to you, sir; candle-rents.
B. Jonson, Volpone, v. 4.

Forc'd of meer Necessity to eat,
He comes to pawn his Dish, to buy his Meat.
Congreve, tr. of Satires of Juvenal, xi.

A mere courtier, a mere soldier, a mere scholar, a mere anything, is an insipid pedantic character.
Addison, The Man of the Town.

Mere right, in law, the right of property without possession. = Syn. Mere, Bare. Mere is much oftener used than bare. Bare is positive; mere essentially negative. Strictly, bare means only without other things, or no more than: as, the bare mention of a name. Mere seems to imply deficiency: as, mere conjecture; mere folly. In implying smallness of amount it is sometimes the same as bare. In Shakspere, Hamlet, iii. 1, "a bare bodkin" might be expressed by "a mere bodkin."

mere[3]† (mēr), adv. [< mere[3], a.] Absolutely; wholly.

On my faith, your highness
Is mere mistaken in me.
Fletcher, Mad Lover, iii. 4.

I know I shall produce things meere devine.
Marston, The Fawne, ii. 1.

mere[4]† (mēr), a. [ME., also meere, mare, < AS. mære, mēre = OS. māri = OHG. māri, MHG. mære = Icel. mærr = Goth. mērs (in comp. wailamērs), famous; akin to L. memor, mindful, remembering, Skt. √ smar, Zend mar, remember: see memory.] Famous.

mere[5]†, n. A Middle English form of mare[1].

meregoutte (mār'göt), n. [F. mère-goutte, < L. merus, pure, unmixed, + gutta (> F. goutte), a drop: see mere[3] and gout[1].] The first running of must, oil, etc., from the fruit before pressure has been applied to it: usually limited to the juice of the grape.

merel†, n. [Also (pl.) merelles, merils; < ME. merels, < OF. merelle, nine men's morris, F. mérelle, marelle, hopscotch, < merel (ML. merellus, merallus), a counter, a piece in draughts, also a game.] One of the counters or pegs used in the game called fivepenny or nine men's morris; hence (pl.) the game itself. See morris[1].

Merelles, or, as it was formerly called in England, nine men's morris, and also five-penny morris, is a game of some antiquity. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 416.

merely (mēr'li), adv. [Formerly also meerly; < ME. merely; < mere[3] + -ly[2].] 1†. Absolutely; wholly; completely; utterly.

What goodes, catalles, Jewels, plate, ornamentes, or other stuff, do merely belong or apperteyne to all the sayd promocions. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 197.

I wish you all content, and am as happy
In my friend's good as it were merely mine.
Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 3.

2. Simply; solely; only.

Excusing his [Mahomet's] sensuall felicities in the life to come, as meerly allegoricall, and necessarily fitted to rude and vulgar capacities. Sandys, Travailes, p. 46.

The prayers are commonly performed merely as a matter of ceremony. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 212.

merenchyma (me-reng'ki-mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + (παρ)έγχυμα, in mod. sense 'parenchyma': see parenchyma.] In bot., an imperfect cellular tissue composed of more or less rounded cells with large intercellular spaces. Meyen. [Obsolete.]

merenchymatous (mer-eng-kim'a-tus), a. [< merenchyma(t-) + -ous.] Having the structure or appearance of merenchyma.

meresauce†, n. [< ME. meresauce; appar. < OF. mure (ML. muria), pickle, brine, + sauce, sauce. Cf. OF. saulmure, pickle.] Brine or pickle for flesh or fish. Prompt. Parv., p. 334; Palsgrave.

meresman (mērz'man), n. [Formerly also mearsman, meersman; < mere's, poss. of mere[2], + man.] One who points out boundaries. [Obsolete or local.]

The use of the word "mere" has been revived in the meresmen of an Act of Parliament a few years since for ascertaining the boundaries of parishes.
N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 291.

mere-stake (mēr'stāk), n. A pollard or tree standing as a mark or boundary for the division of parts or parcels in coppices or woods. Also called mere-tree.

merestead (mēr'sted), n. [Also meerstead, mesestead; < mere[2] + stead.] The land within a particular mere or boundary; a farm.

The men were intent on their labours,
Busy with hewing and building, with garden plot and with merestead.
Longfellow, Courtship of Miles Standish, viii.

merestone (mēr'stōn), n. [Formerly also meerstone, meerestone; < ME. merestone, merestane; < mere[2] + stone.] 1. A stone to mark a boundary.

The mislaier of a meere stone is to blame. But it is the unjust judge that is the capitall remover of land-markes, when he defineth amisse of lands and property.
Bacon, Judicature.

2. Figuratively, a limit.

That you contain the jurisdiction of the court within the ancient merestones, without removing the mark.
Bacon, Speech to Hutton (Works, XIII. 202).

mereswine†, meerswine†, n. [ME. mereswyne, etc., < OF. marsouin; < mere[1] + swine.] A dolphin or porpoise.

Grassede as a mereswyne with corkes fulle huge.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 1091.

mere-tree (mēr'trē), n. Same as mere-stake.

A meere tree, a tree which is for some bound or limit of land. Nomenclator (1585). (N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 191.)

meretrician (mer-ē-trish'an), a. [= OF. meretriciien, < L. meretrix (-tric-), a prostitute, + -ian.] Of or pertaining to prostitutes; meretricious.

Take from human commerce Meretrician amours.
Tom Brown, Works, III. 263. (Davies.)

meretricious (mer-ē-trish'us), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. meretricio, < L. meretricius, of or pertaining to prostitutes, < meretrix, a prostitute: see meretrix.] 1. Of or pertaining to prostitutes; wanton; libidinous.

The meretricious world claps our cheeks, and fondles us unto failings. Feltham, Resolves, i. 26.

Her deceitful and meretricious traffick with all the nations of the world. Bp. Hall, Hard Texts, Is. xxiii. 17.

2. Alluring by false attractions; having a gaudy but deceitful appearance; tawdry; showy: as, meretricious dress or ornaments.

Pride and artificial gluttonies do but adulterate nature, making our diet healthless, our appetites impatient and unsatisfiable, and the taste mixed, fantastical, and meretricious. Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, ii. 6.

A tawdry carpet, all beflowered and befruited — such a meretricious blur of colors as a hotel offers for vulgar feet to tread upon. T. Winthrop, Cecil Dreeme, xxxviii.

meretriciously (mer-ē-trish'us-li), adv. In a meretricious manner; with false allurement; tawdrily; with vulgar show.

meretriciousness (mer-ē-trish'us-nes), n. The quality of being meretricious: false show or allurement; vulgar finery.

meretrix (mer'ē-triks), n. [L., a prostitute, < merere, earn, gain, serve for pay: see merit.] 1. A prostitute; a harlot.

A beautiful piece,
Hight Aspasia, the meretrix.
B. Jonson, Volpone, i. 1.

That she [Cynthia] was a meretrix is clear from many indications — her accomplishments, her house in the Subura. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 813.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of bivalves: same as Cytherea. Lamarck, 1799.

Merganetta (mėr-ga-net'ä), n. [NL., < Mergus + Gr. νῆττα, a duck.] A remarkable genus of Anatidæ, combining characters of mergansers with those of ordinary ducks, and having furthermore a sharp spur on the bend of the wing; the torrent-ducks. See torrent-duck.

Merganettinæ (mėr'ga-ne-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Merganetta + -inæ.] A subfamily of Anatidæ constituted by the genus Merganetta.

★merganser (mėr-gan'sėr), n. [NL. (> Sp. mergánsar), < L. mergus, a diver (water-fowl), + anser, goose: see Mergus and Anser.] 1. A bird of the genus Mergus or subfamily Merginæ, family Anatidæ; a sawbill, garbill, or fishing-duck.

Hooded Merganser (Lophodytes cucullatus).

A merganser resembles a duck, but has a cylindrical instead of a depressed bill, with a hooked nail at the end, and a serration of very prominent back-set teeth. Several species are among the common water-fowls of the northern hemisphere. The common merganser or goosander, Mergus merganser or Merganser castor, is about 2 feet long, and nearly 3 in extent of wings. In the male the upper parts are glossy-black varied with white on the wings, the lower parts white tinged with salmon-color, the head and neck glossy dark-green like a drake's, and the bill and feet coral- or vermilion-red. The head is slightly crested. The red-breasted merganser, M. serrator, is a similar but somewhat smaller bird, with a reddish breast and the head more decidedly crested. The hooded merganser, Lophodytes cucullatus, is still smaller, black and white, with a beautiful erect semicircular crest. A South American species, distinct from any of the foregoing, is Mergus brasiliensis.

2. [cap.] A genus of Merginæ: same as Mergus.

merge (mėrj), v.; pret. and pp. merged, ppr. merging. [< OF. merger, mergir = It. mergere, < L. mergere, dive, dip, immerse, sink in, = Skt. √ majj, dip, bathe. Hence emerge, immerge, submerge, immerse, etc.] I. intrans. To sink or disappear in something else; be swallowed up; lose identity or individuality: with in.

He is to take care, undoubtedly, that the ecclesiastic shall not merge in the farmer. Scott, Speech, April, 1802.

Fear, doubt, thought, life itself, ere long Merged in one feeling deep and strong.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, ii.

II. trans. To cause to be absorbed or engrossed; sink the identity or individuality of; make to disappear in something else: followed by in (sometimes by into): as, all fear was merged in curiosity.

The plaintiff became the purchaser and merged his term in the fee. Chancellor Kent.

The names of Castilian and Aragonese were merged in the comprehensive one of Spaniard.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 26.

merger[1] (mėr'jėr), n. [< merge + -er[1].] One who or that which merges.

★merger[2] (mėr'jėr), n. [< OF. merger, inf. as noun, a merging: see merge.] 1. In the law of conveyancing, the sinking or obliteration of a lesser estate in lands, etc., resulting when it is transferred without qualification to the owner of a greater estate in the same property (or the like transfer of the greater estate to the owner of the lesser), if there be no intermediate estate. At common law the lesser estate was not deemed to be added to the greater, but to be extinguished, so as to free the greater estate from the qualification or impairment which the existence of the lesser estate had constituted. Thus, if an owner of the fee of land on which there was an outstanding lease, owned by another person, acquired the lease, the lease was thereby annulled, and he thereafter held simply as owner of the fee. It resulted sometimes that, if his title to the fee proved defective, he could not avail himself of any claim under the lease.

Merger is the act of law, and is the annihilation of one estate in another. Its effect is to consolidate two estates, and to conform them into one estate.
Mayhew, On Merger, I. i.

2. In the law of contracts, the extinguishment of a security for a debt by the creditor's acceptance of a higher security, such as a bond in lieu of a note, or a judgment in lieu of either: so called because such acceptance, by operation of law, and without intention of the parties, merges the lower security.

mergh, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of marrow[1].

Merginæ (mėr-jī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mergus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Anatidæ, typified by the genus Mergus; the mergansers. See merganser.

Mergulus (mėr'gū-lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), dim. of Mergus, q. v.] A genus of small three-toed web-footed marine birds of the auk family, Alcidæ; the dovekies. There is but one species, M. alle. Also called Alle. See cut under dovekie.

Mergus (mėr'gus), n. [NL., < L. mergus, a diver (water-fowl), < mergere, dive: see merge.] The typical genus of Merginæ, formerly coextensive with the subfamily, now restricted to such species as the goosander, M. merganser, and the red-breasted merganser, M. serrator. See merganser.

meri (mā'ri), n. [Maori mere.] A war-ax or war-club used by the natives of New Zealand. It is seldom less than a foot or more than 18 inches long, and is made of wood, bone, basaltic stone, or green jade.

meriæum (mē-ri-ē'um), n.; pl. meriæa (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μηριαῖον, neut. of μηριαῖος, belonging to the thigh, < μηρός, the thigh: see meros.] In entom., a posterior inflected part of the metasternum of beetles, forming the anterior surface of the socket of the hind leg. Knoch.

Meriania (mer-i-an'i-ä), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1800), named after M. S. Merian, a Dutch artist.] A genus of plants of the family Melastomaceæ, type of the tribe Merianieæ. There are about 30 species, natives of tropical America and the West Indies. They are erect shrubs or trees with long-petioled oblong-lanceolate leaves and large yellow or purple flowers. Some of the species are cultivated in greenhouses, under the name of Jamaica roses.

Merianieæ (mer″i-a-nī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), ⟨ Meriania + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Melastomaceæ, based on the genus Meriania, characterized by the generally terete or slightly angular capsular fruit and the angulated, cuneate, or fusiform seeds. It embraces 12 genera and about 118 species of tropical American shrubs and trees.

mericarp (mer′i-kärp), n. [= F. méricarpe, ⟨ Gr. μέρος, a part, + καρπός, fruit.] One of the two achene-like carpels which form a cremocarp or fruit of umbelliferous plants: same as hemicarp.

merides, n. Plural of meris.

Meridiaceæ (mē-rid-i-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Rabenhorst, 1864), ⟨ Meridion + -aceæ.] A small family of diatoms, taking its name from the genus Meridion and possibly including the genus Oncosphenia. The frustule is cuneate, producing fan-shaped colonies, without central nodule. With the exception of a few doubtful forms they live in fresh water. Preferably Meridionaceæ.

meridial† (mē-rid′i-al), a. [ME. merydyall; ⟨ LL. meridialis, of midday, ⟨ meridies, midday: see meridian.] Of midday; meridian.

Whole men of what age or complexion so euer they be of, shulde take theyr naturall rest and slepe in the nyght: and to eschewe merydyall sleep.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 244.

★meridian (mē-rid′i-an), a. and n. [⟨ ME. meridian, ⟨ OF. meridien, ⟨ F. méridien = Sp. Pg. It. meridiano, ⟨ L. meridianus, of or belonging to midday or to the south, southern, ⟨ meridies, midday, the south, orig. medidies*, ⟨ medius, middle, + dies, day: see medium, *mid*¹, and dial.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to midday or noon; noonday: as, the meridian sun; the sun's meridian heat or splendor.

In what place that any maner man ys at any tyme of the yer whan that the sonne by moevyng of the firmament cometh to his verrey meridian place, than is hit verrey Midday, that we clepen owre noon, as to thilke man; and therfore is it cleped the lyne of midday.
Chaucer, Astrolabe, ii. § 39.

Towards heaven and the full blazing sun,
Which now sat high in his meridian tower.
Milton, P. L., iv. 30.

The sun rode high in the heavens, and its meridian blaze was powerfully felt. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 131.

2. Pertaining to the culmination or highest point or degree (the sun being highest at midday); culminating; highest before a decline: as, Athens reached its meridian glory in the age of Pericles.—3. Pertaining to or marking a geographical north and south line; extending in the arc of a great circle passing through the poles: as, a meridian circle on an artificial globe.—4. Noting the eighth of Professor H. Rogers's twelve divisions of the Paleozoic series in the Appalachian chain of North America, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day: it corresponds with the Oriskany sandstone (which see, under sandstone).—5†. Consummate; complete.

An effrontery out of the mouth of a meridian villain.
Roger North, Examen, p. 186. (Davies.)

Meridian altitude of a star. See altitude.—Meridian line on a dial, the twelve o'clock hour-line.

II. n. 1. Midday; noon.—2†. Midday repose or indulgence; nooning: used specifically as in the quotations.

We have, . . . in the course of this our toilsome journey, lost our meridian (the hour of repose at noon, which in the middle ages was employed in slumber, and which the monastic rules of nocturnal vigils rendered necessary).
Scott, Monastery, xix.

Plumdamas joined the other two gentlemen in drinking their meridian (a bumper-dram of brandy).
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, iv.

3. The highest point reached before a decline; the culmination; the point of greatest increment or development.

You seem to marvel I do not marry all this while, considering that I am past the Meridian of my Age.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 60.

In the meridian of Edward's age and vigour.
Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 8.

4. In geog., a great circle passing through the poles of the earth, or the half of such a circle included between the poles. The meridian of a place is such a half-circle passing through it and the poles. In astron., it is the circle of the celestial sphere which passes through the observer's zenith and the poles; the hour-circle which passes through the zenith. See hour-circle.

5. Figuratively, the state or condition (in any respect) of the people of one place or region, or of persons in one sphere or plane of existence, as compared with those of or in another: as, the institutions or customs of Asia are not suited to the meridian of Europe.

All other knowledge merely serves the concerns of this life, and is fitted to the meridian thereof.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

First or prime meridian, the meridian from which longitude is reckoned, as that of Greenwich. See longitude, 2.—Magnetic meridian of any place, a great circle the plane of which passes through that place and the line of direction of the horizontal magnetic needle. The angle which the magnetic makes with the true geographical meridian is different in different places and at different times, and is called the magnetic declination or the variation of the compass. See declination, and agonic line (under agonic).—Meridian of a globe, a meridian drawn upon a globe; especially, a brass circle concentric with the globe, and having the axis of rotation of the globe fixed in the plane of one of its faces.—Secondary meridian, in geog., a meridian whose longitude from the prime meridian has been so well determined that trustworthy longitudes may be ascertained by measuring from it.

meridian-circle (mē-rid′i-an-sėr″kl), n. An astronomical instrument consisting of a telescope with cross-wires and moving in the plane of the meridian, and provided with a graduated circle. The meridian-circle subserves the same purposes as the transit-instrument, and also determines the declinations of stars.

meridian-mark (mē-rid′i-an-märk), n. A mark placed exactly north or south of a transit-instrument at a considerable distance, to aid in adjusting the instrument in the meridian. It is sometimes placed near, with a lens interposed to render the rays from it parallel as if it were really remote.

meridies (mē-rid′i-ēz), n. [L.: see meridian.] Meridian; mid-point. [Rare.]

About the hour that Cynthia's silver light
Had touch'd the pale meridies of the night.
Cowley, Essays (Agriculture).

Meridion (mē-rid′i-on), n. [NL. (Agardh, 1824), ⟨ Gr. μερίδιον, a small part, dim. of μέρος, a part.] A genus of diatoms with cuneate frustule, typical of the family Meridionaceæ of Kuetzing.

★meridional (mē-rid′i-ō-nal), a. [⟨ ME. meridional, meridionel, ⟨ OF. meridional, F. méridional = Pr. Sp. Pg. meridional = It. meridionale, ⟨ LL. meridionalis, of midday, ⟨ L. meridies, midday: see meridian.] 1. Pertaining to the meridian; having a direction like that of a terrestrial meridian.

The meridional lines stand wider upon one side then the other. Sir T. Browne, Garden of Cyrus, iv.

Along one side of this body is a meridional groove, resembling that of a peach. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 427.

2. Highest; consummate.

The meridional brightness, the glorious noon, and height, is to be a Christian. Donne, Sermons, xvii.

3. Southern; southerly; extending or turned toward the south.

Ethiope is departed in 2 princypalle parties; and that is, in the Est partie and in the Meridionelle partie: the whiche partie meridionelle is clept Moretane.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 156.

The which lyne . . . is cleped the sowth lyne, or elles the lyne meridional. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. 4.

4. Characteristic of southern climates or southern peoples.

A dark meridional physiognomy.
Motley, United Netherlands, I. 139.

Meridional distance. See distance.—Meridional parts, the distance of any given latitude from the equator upon Mercator's map-projection expressed in minutes of the equator. Neglecting the compression, the meridional parts are proportional to the integral of the secant of the latitude, which is the logarithm of the tangent of half the polar distance. Taking account of the compression, the secant of the latitude must be divided before integrating by $1 + e^2 \cos^2 \phi$ (where ϕ is the latitude and e the ellipticity of the meridian).

meridionality (mē-rid″i-ō-nal′i-ti), n. [⟨ meridional + -ity.] 1. The state of being meridional or on the meridian.—2. Position in the south; aspect toward the south.

meridionally (mē-rid′i-ō-nal-i), adv. [⟨ meridional + *-ly*².] In the direction of the meridian; north and south.

Who [the Jews], reverentially declining the situation of their Temple, nor willing to lye as that stood, doe place their beds from north to south, and delight to sleep meridionally. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 3.

★merihedric (mer-i-hē′drik), a. [⟨ Gr. μέρος, a part, + ἕδρα, a seat, base.] Pertaining to some part of the faces of a polyhedron, taken according to some regular system.

merils†, n. See merels.

meringue (mę-rang′), n. [F., said to be ⟨ Meh-ringen, a town in Germany.] In cookery, a mixture of white of eggs and sugar slightly browned, used for ornamenting and supplementing other confections. Puddings or tarts, etc., covered with this preparation are sometimes called meringues.—Meringue glacé, ice-cream served with a casing of meringue.

merino (mę-rē′nō), a. and n. [= F. mérinos = Pg. merino, merino (sheep), ⟨ Sp. merino, roving from pasture to pasture (said of sheep), ⟨ merino, an inspector of sheepwalks, a shepherd of merino sheep, also a royal judge, ⟨ ML. majorinus (used in Spain), the head of a village, a steward, majordomo; cf. majoralis, a chief, in Spain a head shepherd, ⟨ L. major, greater, in ML. a head, chief, etc.: see major, mayor.] I. a. 1. Noting a variety of sheep from Spain, or their wool. See below.—2. Made of the wool of the merino sheep: as, merino stockings or underclothing. The articles so designated are usually made with an admixture of cotton to prevent shrinkage.—Merino sheep, a variety of sheep originally peculiar to Spain, but now introduced into many other countries. They are raised chiefly for the sake of their long fine wool, the mutton being but little esteemed. In summer the Spanish sheep feed upon the elevated lands of Biscay, Navarre, and Aragon, and toward winter are driven southward to the fertile plains of New Castile, Andalusia, and Estremadura.

II. n. 1. A merino sheep.—2. A thin woolen cloth, twilled on both sides and used especially for women's dresses, now to some extent superseded by cashmere. It was originally made of the wool of the merino sheep. There is a variety which has an admixture of silk.

3. A variety of tricot or knitted material for undergarments. [U. S.]

merion (mē′ri-on), n. [= F. mérione, ⟨ NL. Meriones, q. v.] A book-name of the deer-mouse or jumping-mouse of North America, Zapus hudsonius, formerly placed in the genus Meriones under the name of M. hudsonicus. See cut under deer-mouse, 1.

Meriones (mē-rī′ō-nēz), n. [NL., so called with ref. to the development of the hind legs (cf. Gr. Μηριόνης, a man's name, companion of Idomeneus), ⟨ Gr. μηρία, thigh-bones, ⟨ μηρός, thigh.] A genus of saltatorial myomorphic rodents. The name has been applied: (a) By Illiger, 1811, to the Old World jerboas: a synonym of Dipus. (b) By Frédéric Cuvier, 1825, to a different genus of American jumping-mice, now called Zapus. [Disused in both senses.]

meris (mē′ris), n.; pl. merides (-ri-dēz). [NL., ⟨ F. méride (Perrier), ⟨ Gr. μερίς (μεριδ-), a part.] A permanent colony of cells or plastids, which may remain isolated or may multiply by gemmation to form higher aggregates called demes. See deme and zoöid. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 842.

merismatic (mer-is-mat′ik), a. [⟨ Gr. μέρισμα, a part, μερισμός, a division, ⟨ μερίζειν, divide, ⟨ μέρος, a part: see merit.] In biol., dividing by the formation of internal partitions; taking place by internal partition into cells or segments.

Merismatic cells, remaining without function sometimes for several years, until the sap-wood containing them becomes dry or heart wood, when they begin their activity.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 680.

merispore (mer′i-spōr), n. [⟨ Gr. μέρος or μερίς, a part, division, + σπόρα, seed.] One of the individual cells or secondary spores of a pluricellular (septate or compound) spore.

meristem (mer′is-tem), n. [Irreg. ⟨ Gr. μεριστός, verbal adj. of μερίζειν, divide, ⟨ μέρος, a part.] Embryonic tissue; undifferentiated, growing, actively dividing cells. Meristem is found in the growing parts of plants. The cells consist of a dense fine granular mass of cytoplasm, in which is embedded a relatively large nucleus. Sap-vacuoles are absent or minute. The metaplasm is small in amount. Intercellular spaces are absent. In the higher plants, the fertilized egg-cell gives rise to a mass of undifferentiated dividing cells—the primitive meristem; part of this soon differentiates into various of the permanent tissues, while the remainder, as primary meristem, continues to be a source of increase of permanent tissue. Certain permanent tissues may regain the power of cell division and in this condition constitute secondary meristem. This is usually of short duration.

meristematic (mer″is-tē-mat′ik), a. [< meristem + -atic[2].] Consisting of or pertaining to the meristem.

meristematically (mer″is-tē-mat′i-kal-i), adv. After the manner of meristem.

meristogenetic (me-ris-tō-jē-net′ik), a. [< Gr. μεριστός, verbal adj. of μερίζειν, divide (see meristem), + γένεσις, generation: see genetic.] Produced by a meristem.

merit (mer′it), n. [< ME. merite, meryte, maret, < OF. merite, F. mérite = Pr. merit, merite = Sp. mérito = Pg. It. merito, < L. meritum, that which one deserves, desert (good or bad); also, a ground of desert (service, kindness, benefit, or fault, blame, demerit), worth, value, importance; neut. of meritus, pp. of merere, mereri (> OF. merir), deserve, be worthy of, earn, gain, get, acquire, buy, in military use (sc. stipendia), earn pay, serve for pay; lit. 'receive as a share,' akin to Gr. μέρος, μερίς, a part, share, division, μόρος, a part, lot, fate, destiny, μοῖρα, lot, μείρεσθαι, share, divide. Cf. mercantile, mercenary, merchant, mercy, etc., from the same ult. source.]

1. That which is deserved; honor or reward due; recompense or consideration deserved. [Rare.]

> We beleven of the day of Doom, and that every man schalle have his Meryte, aftre he hathe disserved.
> Mandeville, Travels, p. 135.
>
> A dearer merit, not so deep a maim, . . .
> Have I deserved at your highness' hands.
> Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 156.
>
> All power
> I give thee; reign forever, and assume > Thy merits. Milton, P. L., iii. 319.

2. The state or fact of deserving; desert, good or bad; intrinsic ground of consideration or award: most commonly in the plural: as, to treat a person according to his merits.

> Here men may seen how synne hath his merite.
> Chaucer, Doctor's Tale, l. 277.
>
> Nothing [no punishment] is great enough for Silius' merit. B. Jonson, Sejanus, ii. 1.
>

> To that bad eminence. Milton, P. L., ii. 5.
>
> Praise from a friend, or censure from a foe,
> Are lost on hearers that our merits know.
> Pope, Iliad, x. 294.

Specifically—3. The state or fact of deserving well; good desert; worthiness of reward or consideration.

> Reputation is . . . oft got without merit, and lost without deserving. Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 270.
>
> This letter hath more merit than one of more diligence, for I wrote it in my bed, and with much pain.
> Donne, Letters, xiv.
>
> Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul.
> Pope, R. of the L., v. 34.

4. Good quality in general; excellence.

> The great merit of Walter Scott's novels is their generous and pure sentiment. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 316.

5. That which deserves consideration or reward; ground of desert; claim to notice or commendation: as, to enumerate the merits of a person, a book, or a scheme.

> What a merit were it in death to take this poor maid from the world! Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 240.
>
> It was the merit of Montaigne to rise . . . into the clear world of reality. Lecky, Rationalism, I. 113.

6. pl. In law, the right and wrong of a case; the strict legal or equitable rights of the parties, as distinguished from questions of procedure and matters resting in judicial discretion or favor; essential facts and principles that lead to an opinion clear of personal bias: as, to judge a case on its merits.—Figure of merit, a numerical coefficient of excellence in the performance of any instrument, as a chronometer, gun, etc.—Merit of condignity, merit of congruity. See quotation under condignity, 2.—Order for Merit, a Prussian order composed of two classes, military and civil. The first class was founded by Frederick the Great in 1740. The badge is a blue enameled cross adorned with the letter F., the words "pour le mérite," and golden eagles. Since 1810 it has been given exclusively for distinction on the field. The second class (or second order) was founded by Frederick William IV. in 1842 for distinction in science and art.=Syn. Worth, etc. See desert[2], n.

merit (mer′it), v. [< ME. meriten,* < OF. meriter, F. mériter = Sp. meritar = It. meritare, < L. meritare, earn, gain, serve for pay, freq. of merere, earn, gain, merit: see merit, n.] I. trans. 1. To deserve; earn a right or incur a liability to; be or become deserving of: as, to merit reward or punishment.

> Holmes, Acad. of Arm., ii. 11, § 57. (Nares.)

2. A hardy, active pony, somewhat larger than the Shetland, found in Wales.

> The county [Montgomery] was long famous for its hardy breed of small horses called merlins, which are still to be met with. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 789.

merling (mėr'ling), n. [< ME. merlyng, merlynge, with accom. term. -ing (as in whiting) (ML. merlingus), < OF. merlan, merlanc, merlanke, F. merlan (> Sp. marlan), a whiting, < L. merula, a fish, the sea-carp, a transferred use of merula, a blackbird.] A small gadoid fish, Merlangus merlangus, the European whiting.

Merlin's-grass (mėr'linz-gràs), n. A species of quillwort, Isoëtes lacustris, growing in lakes. According to a local Welsh tradition, it is marvelously nourishing to cattle and fishes.

merlon (mėr'lon), n. [< F. merlon = Sp. merlón = Pg. merlão, a merlon, < It. merlo, a merlon, perhaps < LL. mœrulus,* dim. of mœrus, murus, wall: see mure.] In fort., the plain member of masonry or other material which separates two crenelles or embrasures; a cop. See battlement.

The battery was soon erected, the merlons being framed of logs and filled with earth. Franklin, Autobiog., p. 175.

The merlons of the Guelf battlements were square, those of the Ghibelline were "a coda di rondine"—that is, in shape like the letter M.
C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 200.

Merluciidæ (mėr-lū-sī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Merlucius + -idæ.] In Gill's system of classification, a family of Gadoidea or gadoid fishes, represented by the genus Merlucius. The caudal region is moderate and coniform behind; the caudal rays are procurrent forward; the anus is submedian; the suborbital bones are moderate; the mouth is terminal; the ventral fins are subjugular; the dorsal fin is double, a short anterior and a long posterior one; there is a long anal fin corresponding to the second dorsal; the ribs are wide, approximated and channeled below, or with inflected sides; and there are paired excavated frontal bones with divergent crests continuous from the forked occipital crest. The family includes the English hake and related fishes.

merluciine (mėr-lū'si-in), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Merluciidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A gadoid fish of the family Merluciidæ.

merlucioid (mėr-lū'si-oid), a. Like a hake; of or pertaining to the Merluciidæ.

Merlucius (mėr-lū'si-us), n. [NL., < F. merluche, merlus, OF. merlus, merluz (= Sp. merluza = It. merluzzo, the hake), dried haddock, < merlus, haddock, according to Ménage, < L. maris lucius, ocean pike: maris, gen. of mare, the sea; lucius, a fish, perhaps the pike: see luce[1].] A genus of fishes represented by the common hake of Europe, M. merlucius, and type of the family Merluciidæ. Also spelled Merluccius.

mermaid (mėr'mād), n. [< ME. mermayde, meremayde; < mere[1] + maid. Cf. merminden.] A fabled marine or amphibian creature having the form of a woman above the waist and that of a fish below, endowed with human attributes, and usually working harm, with or without malignant intent, to mortals with whom she might be thrown into relation.

Chauntecleer so free
Sang merier than the mermayde in the see.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 450.

And as for the meremaides called Nereides, it is no fabulous tale that goeth of them; for looke, how painters draw them, so they are indeed. Holland, tr. of Pliny, ix. 5.

Who would be
A mermaid fair,
Singing alone,
Combing her hair
Under the sea?
Tennyson, The Mermaid.

False mermaid, the Flœrkea proserpinacoides, an inconspicuous annual plant of the northern United States, resembling the mermaid-weed.—Mermaid lace, a fine Venetian point-lace.—Mermaid's fish-lines, a common seaweed, Chorda filum: so called from its cord-like appearance. See Chorda, 2.

mermaiden (mėr'mā″dn), n. [< ME. mermaiden, mermayden, meremaiden; < mere[1] + maiden. Cf. mermaid.] A mermaid; a siren.

Goth now rather awey, ye mermaydenes [L. sirenes], whiche that ben swete til it be at the laste.
Chaucer, Boëthius, i. prose 1.

Mermen and mermaidens. The Century, XXXV. 537.

mermaid-fish (mėr'mād-fish), n. An angel-fish, Squatina Squatina, unnaturally set up for a mermaid by a taxidermist.

mermaid's-egg (mėr'mādz-eg), n. Same as mermaid's-purse.

mermaid's-glove (mėr'mādz-gluv), n. 1. A name given to the largest of British sponges, Halichondria oculata, from its tendency to branch into a form bearing a remote resemblance to a glove with extended fingers. It sometimes attains a height of 2 feet.—2. A kind of alcyonarian polyp, Alcyonium digitatum: same as dead-men's-fingers.

mermaid's-hair (mėr'mādz-hār), n. A blackish-green filamentous species of seaweed, Lyngbya majuscula. See Lyngbya.

mermaid's-head (mėr'mādz-hed), n. A popular British name of a spatangoid sea-urchin, as the Spatangus or Amphidetus cordatus. Also called heart-urchin.

mermaid's-purse (mėr'mādz-pėrs), n. An egg-case or ovicapsule of a skate, ray, or shark. Also called sea-purse and sea-barrow.

Mermaid's-purse.—Egg-purse of Nurse-hound (Scyliorhinus stellaris), about natural size.

These cases are frequently found on the sea-shore, and are called mermaid's-purses. Yarrell, British Fishes.

mermaid-weed (mėr'mād-wēd), n. A plant of the genus Proserpinaca, which consists of a single species, marsh-herbs of North America, having comb-toothed leaves and inconspicuous flowers.

mermaladet, n. An obsolete form of marmalade.

merman (mėr'man), n.; pl. mermen (-men). [Early mod. E. also mereman, meareman;* < ME. mereman (= D. meerman = G. meermann); < mere[1] + man. Cf. mermin and mermaid.] 1. A fabulous man of the sea, with the lower part of the body that of a fish.

A thing turmoyling in the sea we spide,
Like to a meareman.
John Taylor, Works, ii. 22. (Nares.)

2. In her., same as triton.

mermian (mėr'mi-an), n. [< Mermis + -an.] A land-hairworm of the family Mermiidæ or Mermithidæ. In their early stages these worms are parasitic in the visceral cavities of insects, and the young are able to move over the ground or even on trees during heavy dews or in wet weather.

mermint, n. [ME., also mermyn, pl. merminnen, < mereminnen, < AS. meremennen, meremenen, meremen, f. (= MD. merminne, maerminne, f., = MLG. merminne = OHG. meremanne, meremenni, merimeni, merimin, mermin, n., meriminī, meriminna, f., MHG. mereminne, merminne, f., a mermaid, = (with additional suffix) Icel. marmennill, marmendill (mod. marbendill), also margmelli = Norw. marmæle, a sea-goblin); < mere, sea, + mennen, fem. of man, mann, man: see mere[1] and man, and cf. merman.] A mermaid or merman.

The oost of Rome sīȝ [saw] mermyns in liknes of men and of wommen. Trevisa, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon.

Ther heo funden the merminnen
That beoth deor of muchele ginnen.
Layamon, i. 56.

Mermis (mėr'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρμις, a cord, string.] The typical genus of Mermithidæ. M. nigrescens and M. albescens are examples.

Mermithidæ (mėr-mith'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mermis (Mermith-) + -idæ.] A family of nematoid worms, typified by the genus Mermis, belonging to the order Gordiaceæ; the land-hairworms. They are aproctous Nematoidea, with a very long filiform body and six oral papillæ, the male having two spicules and three rows of papillæ on the broadened caudal region. The worms in their larval state are parasitic, like the true gordians, being found in the bodies of various insects. When mature they live in the ground, and sometimes swarm to the surface in such numbers as to give rise to the vulgar belief that it has rained worms. Also Mermididæ, Mermiidæ.

meroblast (mer'ō-blast), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part (see merit), + βλαστός, a germ.] In embryol., a meroblastic ovum; an egg or ovum containing food-yolk or nutritive protoplasm besides the formative or germinal protoplasm: distinguished from holoblast.

meroblastic (mer-ō-blas'tik), a. [< meroblast + -ic.] In embryol., partially germinal: applied by Remak to those eggs in which there is much food-yolk which does not undergo segmentation or take part in germination: opposed to holoblastic. Birds, reptiles, most fishes, and most invertebrates have meroblastic eggs.

merocele (mē'rō-sēl), n. [< Gr. μηρός, thigh, + κήλη, tumor.] Femoral hernia. See hernia.

merocerite (mē-ros'e-rīt), n. [< Gr. μηρός, thigh, + κέρας, horn, + -ite[2].] In Crustacea, one of the joints of an antenna, borne upon the ischiocerite. See antenna.

meroceritic (mē-ros-e-rit'ik), a. [< merocerite + -ic.] Of the nature of a merocerite.

merogastrula (mer-ō-gas'trō-lä), n.; pl. merogastrulæ (-lē). [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + NL. gastrula, q. v.] The gastrula, of whatever form, of a meroblastic egg. It is a discogastrula if the partial segmentation is discoidal, a perigastrula if the segmentation is superficial as well as partial.

merogenesis (mer-ō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + γένεσις, generation: see genesis.] In biol., segmentation; origination of the segments of which an organized body may consist. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 183.

merogenetic (mer″ō-jē-net'ik), a. [< merogenesis, after genetic.] Pertaining to, characterized by, or exhibiting merogenesis.

merohedral (mer-ō-hē'dral), a. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + ἑδρα, seat, base, + -al.] In crystal., same as hemihedral.

merohedrism (mer-ō-hē'drizm), n. [As merohedr-al + -ism.] Same as hemihedrism.

meroistic (mer-ō-is'tik), a. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + ᾠόν, egg (ovum), + -istic.] Secreting not only ova, but also vitelligenous cells: applied to the ovaries of insects. See panoistic.

Dr. A. Brandt has proposed the term panoistic for ovaries of the first mode, and meroistic for those of the second and third modes of development.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 381.

★meromorph (mer'ō-môrf), a. Same as meromorphic.

meromorphic (mer-ō-môr'fik), a. [< Gr. μέρος, part, fraction, + μορφή, form.] Similar in nature to a rational fraction.—Meromorphic function, in the theory of functions, a function which, so long as the variable remains within a certain part of the plane of imaginary quantity within which the function is said to be meromorphic, varies continuously, has a derivative, and is monotropic except in going round certain points or isolated values of the variable called poles, at which the function becomes infinite. The function is, therefore, of the nature of a fraction whose numerator and denominator may be infinite series. An older name is fractionary function.

Meromyaria (mer″ō-mī-ā'ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέρος, a part, + μῦς, a muscle, + -aria.] One of the three principal divisions of the Nematoidea, containing those threadworms which have only eight longitudinal series of muscle-cells, two between each dorsal and ventral line and lateral area respectively. See Polymyaria, Holomyaria.

meromyarian (mer″ō-mī-ā'ri-an), a. [< Meromyaria + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Meromyaria.

meroparonymy (mer″ō-pa-ron'i-mi), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + παρωνυμία, paronymy: see paronymy.] Partial paronymy; adoption or naturalization of a Latin or Greek word in only one or two modern languages. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 519. [Rare.]

Meropidæ (mē-rop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Merops + -idæ.] An Old World family of tenuirostral picarian birds, typified by the genus Merops; the bee-eaters or apiasters. They have the feet not zygodactyl, the bill long, slender, and acute, the sternum four-notched behind, the carotid single, the cæodochon nude, and a spinal apterium. The range of the family is extensive, including the Palearctic, Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australasian regions. The family contains upward of 30 species, divided into several genera, and by Gray into 2 subfamilies, Nyctiornithinæ and Meropinæ. See cut under bee-eater.

meropidan (mē-rop'i-dan), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Meropidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A bird of the family Meropidæ.

Meropinæ (mer-ō-pī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Merops + -inæ.] The leading subfamily of Meropidæ, containing nearly all the species.

meropodite (mē-rop'ō-dīt), n. [< Gr. μηρός, thigh, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot, + -ite[2].] The fourth joint of a developed endopodite, between the ischiopodite and the carpopodite. See cut under endopodite.

meropoditic (mē-rop-ō-dit'ik), a. [< meropodite + -ic.] Of the nature of a meropodite: as, the meropoditic segment of the leg.

Merops (mē'rops), n. [NL., < L. merops, < Gr. μέροψ, a bird, the bee-eater, appar. the same as μέροψ, speaking, endued with speech, < μέρος, a part, μείρεσθαι, divide, + ὄψ, voice.] The typical genus of Meropidæ. Birds of this genus are of lithe and slender form, somewhat like that of the swallow, which they also resemble in their mode of flight. The bill is long and slender, the wings are long and pointed, the tail has the two middle feathers lengthened, and the plumage is beautifully variegated with bright colors. They prey on insects, especially bees, wasps, and other hymenopters, which they capture on the wing. There are several species, the best-known of which is M. apiaster, the only one of general distribution in Europe, though a second, M. ægyptius, is also found in parts of Europe. See bee-eater. Also called Apiaster.

merorganization (me-rôr″gan-i-zā′shon), n. [< Gr. μέρος, part, + E. organization.] Organization in part, or partial organization. [Rare.]

meros, merus (mē′ros, -rus), n. [NL., < Gr. μηρός, thigh.] 1. In zoöl., one of the joints of a maxilliped.—2. In anat., the thigh, femur, or femoral segment of the hind limb, extending from the hip to the knee, and corresponding to the brachium of the fore limb.

merosomal (mer′ō-sō-mal), a. [< merosome + -al.] Of the nature of a merosome.

merosome (mer′ō-sōm), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + σῶμα, body.] In zoöl., one of the definite successive parts or segments of which the body is composed; a metamere; a somite. Thus, one of the rays of a starfish, or one of the rings of a worm or crustacean, is a merosome.

Merostomata (mer-ō-stō′ma-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μηρός, thigh, + στόμα, mouth.] A group of articulated animals to which various values and limits have been assigned. (a) Named by Dana as an order of crustaceans, containing the horseshoe-crabs, or Xiphosura. (b) Extended to the Limulidæ and the Eurypterida. (c) Extended to the Limulidæ, Eurypterida, and Trilobita, as a class of crustaceans: synonymous with Gigantostraca and with Palæocarida. (d) Having the same limits as (c), but associated with the Arachnida. (e) Restricted, as an order of crustaceans, to the Limulidæ: synonymous with Xiphosura. (f) Restricted, as an order of Gigantostraca, to the Eurypterida, and synonymous therewith. See Pœcilopoda. It embraces the orders Xiphosura, Synziphosura, Eurypteridæ.

merostomatous (mer-ō-stom′a-tus), a. [< Merostomata + -ous.] Pertaining to the Merostomata, or having their characters.

merostome (mer′ō-stōm), n. One of the Merostomata, as a trilobite or a horseshoe-crab.

merostomous (me-ros′tō-mus), a. [< merostome + -ous.] Same as merostomatous.

-merous. [< Gr. -μερής, combining form of μέρος, a part.] A suffix denoting 'parted,' 'divided into parts': often used in botany with a numerical prefix, as 2-merous, 3-merous, etc., to be read dimerous, trimerous, etc., according to the Greek.

Merovingian (mer-ō-vin′ji-an), a. and n. [= F. Mérovingien, < ML. Merovingi, the descendants of Merovæus, an ancestor of the founder of the dynasty, < OHG. Merowig* or Merwig.] I. a. Taking name from Merowig or Merwig (L. Merovæus), an alleged chief or king of a part of the Salian Franks and grandfather of Clovis: as, the Merovingian race, dynasty, or period. Clovis, invading the Roman part of Gaul in A. D. 486, founded the Merovingian or first race of French kings (several often reigning at the same time in different parts of France), which was succeeded by the Carolingian dynasty in 751 or 752. Some suppose Merowig or Merovæus to have been the patronymic of the family or clan of Clovis, derived from a more remote ancestor.—Merovingian writing, a variety of cursive script full of flourishes and difficult enlacements and combinations of letters, peculiar to the Merovingian period in France: used in many documents still in existence.

The writing of the Frankish empire to which the title of Merovingian has been applied had a wider range than the other national hands. It had a long career both for diplomatic and literary purposes. In this writing, as it appears in documents, we see that the Roman cursive is subjected to a lateral pressure, so that the letters received a curiously cramped appearance, while the heads and tails are exaggerated to inordinate length.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 157.

II. n. A member of the family to which the first dynasty of French kings belonged. See I.

meroxene (me-rok′sēn), n. [< Gr. μέρος, a part, + ξένος, strange, foreign.] A variety of the kind of mica called biotite, distinguished by its optical characters. See biotite and mica[2]. The name was early given by Breithaupt to the Vesuvian biotite, but has recently been limited by Tschermak to those kinds of biotite in which the optic axial plane is parallel to the plane of symmetry.

merpeople (mėr′pē″pl), n. pl. [< mer- (in mermaid, merman) + people.] Fabled inhabitants of the sea with a human body and a fish-like tail: a collective name for mermaids and mermen. Gill, Forum, III. 85.

merret†, v. t. A Middle English form of mar[1].

merrify (mer′i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. merrified, ppr. merrifying. [< merry[1] + -fy.] To cause to be or become merry. [Rare.]

It merryfied us all.

Mme. D'Arblay, Diary, I. 324. (Davies.) merrily (mer′i-li), adv. [< ME. merily, meriely; < merry[1] + -ly[2].] In a merry, cheerful, or glad manner; with mirth and jollity.

merrimake (mer′i-māk), n. and v. See merrymake.

merriment (mer′i-ment), n. [< merry[1] + -ment.] 1. The state of being merry or frolicsome; hilarious enjoyment; jollity: as, boisterous merriment.

Yet was there not with her else any one,
That to her might move cause of meriment.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 3.

His deep eye laughter-stirr'd
With merriment of kingly pride.
Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

2. The act of making merry; mirthful entertainment; frolic.

A number of merriments and jests . . . wherewith they have pleasantly moved much laughter at our manner of serving God. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 30.

We . . . therefore met your loves
In their own fashion, like a merriment.
Shak., L. L. L., v. 2. 794.

3†. A short comedy or play.

Some menial servants of mine own are ready For to present a merriment. Ford, Fancies, v. 3.

=Syn. See jolly.

Chron. Vilodun, p. 125. (Halliwell.)

The seson was myri and softe, and the contre feire and delitable. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 384.

When the merry bells ring round.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 93.

2. Playfully cheerful or gay; enlivened with gladness or good spirits; mirthful in speech or action; frolicsome; hilarious; jubilant: as, a merry company.

On that othir syde he was oon of the beste felowes and myriest that myght be founde. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 136.

Be merry, be merry, my wife has all;
For women are shrews, both short and tall;
'Tis merry in hall, when beards wag all.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 3. 35 (song).

Be merry, sister; I shall make you laugh anon.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

3. Sportive and mirthful in quality or character; jocund; jovial; rollicking; funny: as, a merry heart; a merry song.

This riding rime serueth most aptly to wryte a merie tale, so Rythme royall is fittest for a graue discourse.
Gascoigne, Notes on Eng. Verse (ed. Arber), § 16.

There is a kind of merry war betwixt Signior Benedick and her. Shak., Much Ado, i. 1. 62.

4. Brisk; lively; cheery.

merry[2] (mer′i), n. [Orig. merise*, then merries, applied as a plural to the fruit, whence the sing. merry; < F. merise, wild cherry; origin uncertain. Cf. cherry[1], ult. < F. cerise, cherry.] The wild cherry of England, Prunus avium.

merry-andrew (mer″i-an′drö), n. [< merry[1] + Andrew, a man's name: see Andrew. The name Andrew may refer to some buffoon of that name, of whom nothing is now known (cf. a similar use of some man's name in smart Aleck, a slang term for a would-be smart fellow), or it may be a general appellation like zany, a merry-andrew, ult. identical with John. There appears to be no evidence for the assertion (appar. first made by Hearne) that the name orig. referred to Andrew Boorde, doctor of physic in the reign of Henry VIII., the author of the "Introduction to Knowledge" and other works, and to whom several jest-books were erroneously ascribed (perhaps because of his surname, which recalls ME. boorde, borde, bourde, a jest: see bourd[1]).] One whose business it is to make sport for others by jokes and ridiculous posturing; a buffoon; a clown.

Th' Italian Merry Andrews took their place,
And quite debauch'd the Stage with lewd grimace.
Dryden, Epil. to Univ. of Oxford (1673), l. 11.

merrybouk†, n. [Formerly also merribowke; appar. < merry[1] + bouk[1].] A cold posset.

A sillibub or merribowke. Cotgrave.

merry-go-down (mer′i-gō-doun′), n. Strong ale, or huff-cap. [Old cant.]

I present you with meate, and you . . . can do no less than present mee with the best morning's draught of merry-go-downe in your quarters.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffe, Ded. (Harl. Misc., VI. 145).

merry-go-round (mer′i-gō-round′), n. A revolving machine, consisting of a series of wooden horses or carriage-seats, mounted on a circular platform, on or in which children and sometimes grown persons ride for amusement. In the United States also called a carrousel.

merry-maid (mer′i-mād), n. A dialectal form of mermaid. [Cornwall, Eng.]

merrymake (mer′i-māk), v. i.; pret. and pp. merrymade, ppr. merrymaking. [Also merrimake; < merry[1] + make[1].] To make merry; frolic.

With thee 'twas Marian's dear delight
To moil all day, and merrimake at night.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Tuesday.

The weak and wronged shall sit with me,
And eat and drink, and merrymake and go,
Singing a holiday for every one.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 180.

merrymake (mer′i-māk), n. [< merrymake, v.] A merrymaking; sport; pastime. Also written merrimake.

But when he saw her toy, and gibe, and geare,
And passe the bonds of modest merimake,
Her dalliaunce he despis'd and follies did forsake.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 21.

We'll have feasts,
And funerals also, merrymakes and wars.
Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

merrymaking[1] (mer′i-mā″king), n. The act of making merry; a convivial entertainment; a gay festival.

Can merry-making enter here?
Wordsworth, Matron of Jedborough.

merrymaking[2] (mer′i-mā″king), a. Producing mirth or sport.

His talents lending to exalt the freaks
Of merry-making beggars, . . . provoked
To laughter multiplied in louder peals
By his malicious wit. Wordsworth, Excursion, vi.

merryman[1] (mer′i-man), n. A dialectal form of merman. [Cornwall, Eng.]

merryman[2] (mer′i-man), n.; pl. merrymen (-men). A merry-andrew; a buffoon; a clown: used as an appellative or pretended surname for a clown: as, Mr. Merryman.

merrymeeting (mer'i-mē″ting), n. A meeting for mirth or sport; a merrymaking; a festival.

The studious man prefers a book before a revel, the rigours of contemplation before merry-meetings and jolly company. South, Sermons, VIII. 408.

merry-night (mer'i-nīt), n. A rural festival held in the north of England, where young people meet in the evening for the purpose of dancing.

He hears a sound, and sees the light,
And in a moment calls to mind
That 'tis the village Merry-Night!
Wordsworth, The Waggoner.

merrythought (mer'i-thât), n. The furcula or wishbone of a fowl's breast: so called from the sport of breaking it between two persons of whom each pulls at one of the two ends, to determine which is to be married first, or which is to have a wish gratified that has been mentally formed for the occasion, the winner being the one who gets the longer fragment.

I have known the shooting of a star spoil a night's rest; and have seen a man in love grow pale, and lose his appetite, upon the plucking of a merry-thought.
Addison, Omens.

merry-totter† (mer'i-tot″ėr), n. [< ME. merytotyr, merytoytir, mery totyr, myry totyr; < merry[1] + totter, a swing.] A swing for children. Prompt. Parv., p. 518; Cath. Ang., pp. 235, 390.

The mersion also in water, and the emersion thence, doth figure our death to the former, and reviving to a new life.
Barrow, Baptism.

merswine†, n. See mereswine.

Mertensia (mėr-ten'si-ạ), n. [NL. (Roth, 1797), named after F. C. Mertens, a German botanist.] A genus of boraginaceous plants of the tribe Lithospermeæ, characterized by having bractless or very slightly bracted flower-clusters, an almost naked corolla of bell-funnel shape, and obliquely attached nutlets. There are about 16 species, natives of eastern Europe, extra-tropical Asia, and North America. They are perennial herbs, with alternate entire leaves and handsome blue or purplish flowers in corymbs composed of loose raceme-like clusters. The plants are called smooth lungwort. M. Virginica, the Virginian cowslip or lungwort, is a fine spring wild flower of the eastern United States, also in gardens. Pneumaria maritima, the sea-lungwort, a sea-coast plant of both hemispheres in northern latitudes, also called sea-bugloss, and locally oyster-plant, has sometimes been referred to this genus. See lungwort, 2.

merthe†, n. An obsolete form of mirth.

Meru (mer'ö), n. [Skt. mēru.] In Hind. myth., the central mountain of the earth, of prodigious size and precious material, having on its summit the abode of the gods.

Merula (mer'ụ-lạ), n. [NL., < L. merula, a blackbird: see merle[1].] A genus of thrushes, of the family Turdidæ, giving to that family the alternative name Merulidæ. The genus, in the sense in which it is at present used, was based in 1816 by W. E. Leach upon the European blackbird, Turdus merula, or Merula vulgaris. (See cut under blackbird.) It also includes such species as the ring-ouzel, M. torquata, and the American robin, M. migratoria. By many naturalists it is used as a subgenus or mere synonym of Turdus. Copsichus in one sense is a synonym.

Merulidæ (me-rö'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Merula + -idæ.] A family of dentirostral oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Merula, now usually called Turdidæ; the thrushes. In the classification of Swainson (1837) it was differently constituted from Turdidæ proper, and divided into Brachypodinæ, Myotherinæ, Merulinæ, Crateropodinæ, and Oriolinæ.

meseise†, n. A Middle English form of mis-ease.

meselt (mez'el), n. [Early mod. E. also mesell, messel (rare, the word being prop. ME. only); < ME. mesel, mesell, a leper, < OF. mesel, mezel, meisel, masel, musel, meseau, fem. mesele, meselle, etc., a leper, leprous, < ML. misellus, a leper, lit. a wretched person, a wretch, < L. misellus, a wretch, a noun use of misellus, wretched, unfortunate, dim. of miser, wretched: see miser[1], of which mesel is thus ult. a dim. form, without dim. force. The word mesel became practically obsolete before the middle of the 16th century, being supplanted by leper. It has been to some extent confused by writers with measles (ME. meseles, maseles): see measles. There is no authorized form measle* or measelry* for mesel, meselry, such spellings being recent sophistications of the proper ME. spellings mesel, meselry, due to the confusion mentioned.] A leper.

In that Flom Jordan, Naaman of Syrie bathed him, that was fulle riche, but he was meselle; and there anon he toke his hele. Mandeville, Travels, p. 104.

He that repreveth his neighebor, outher he repreveth hym by som harm of peyne that he hath on his body, as mesel, "croked harlot," or by som synne that he dooth. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Abaffeled up and down the town for a messel and a scoundrel. London Prodigal, ii. 4. (Nares.) meseledt, a. [Also meseldd, mezled, mesled, meselled, messeled (after OF. meselé, pp.); < mesel + -ed[2]. Prob. confused with measled.] Leprous.

Meseau [F.], a meselled, scurvie, leaprous, lazarous person. Cotgrave.

meseledness†, n. [Also meseldness, mezeldness; < meseled + -ness.] Leprosy.

Meselerie [F.], mesledness, leaprosie, scurvinesse. Cotgrave.

mesel-house†, n. [ME., < mesel + house[1].] A hospital for lepers.

And to meselle houses of that same lond, Thre thousand marke onto ther spense he fond.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 136.

meselle†, n. A Middle English form of measles. Cath. Ang., p. 236.

meselry†, n. [ME., also meselrie, mesylery, < OF. meselerie, mezelerie, maselerie, muselerie (ML. reflex meselaria), leprosy, also a house for lepers, < mesel, a leper: see mesel.] Leprosy.

Payne is sent by the rightwys sonde of God, and by his suffrance, be it meselrie, or maheym, or maladie. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Mesembryanthemeæ (me-sem″bri-an-thē'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fenzl, 1835), < Mesembryanthemum + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Aizoaceæ, characterized by having leaves without stipules, and the tube of the calyx adherent to the ovary. It includes 3 genera, Mesembryanthemum, the type, Tetragonia, and Anisostigma, and about 461 species, which, although having a wide range, abound principally in the southern part of Africa. The group was originally given family rank. Sometimes written Mesembryaceæ, Mesembryeæ.

Mesembryanthemum (me-sem-bri-an'thē-mum), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1719), prop. Mesembrianthemum,* < Gr. μεσημβρία, midday, the south (< μέσος, middle, + ἡμέρα, day), + ἄνθεμον, a flower, < ἀνθεῖν, bloom, < ἄνθος, a flower: see anther.] A large genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Aizoaceæ, the carpet-weed family, type of the tribe Mesembryanthemeæ. They are erect or prostrate fleshy herbs, sometimes slightly woody, with thick fleshy leaves, and showy white, yellow, or rose-colored flowers in terminal or axillary clusters. The fruit is a capsule, which is hygroscopic, swelling out and opening in the rain, and so allowing the seeds to escape. The genus embraces some 400 species, reaching by far its greatest development in South Africa, a few species, mostly littoral, being scattered in the Canaries, the Mediterranean region, Australia, etc. A general name for the species is fig-marigold, also midday-flower and pig's-face. M. crystallinum is the ice-plant (which see). M. acinaciforme and M. edule of South Africa are called Hottentot fig. M. dolabriforme is ★the hatchet-leafed fig-marigold (see dolabriform).

mesembryo (me-sem'bri-ō), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἔμβρυον, embryo: see embryo.] The blastula stage of the ova of metazoans, parallel with the adult colonies of such protozoans as Eudorina. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887.

mesembryonic (me-sem-bri-on'ik), a. [< mesembryo(n-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mesembryo.

mesencephalic (mes″en-se-fal'ik or -sef'a-lik), a. [< mesencephalon + -ic.] Situated in the midst of the encephalon, as the midbrain; of or pertaining to the mesencephalon: as, the mesencephalic segment of the brain.

mesencephalon (mes-en-sef'a-lon), n.; pl. mesencephala (-lä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἐγκέφαλος, brain: see encephalon.] The midbrain; a segment of the encephalon consisting essentially of the corpora quadrigemina or optic lobes and the crura cerebri. See brain. Also mesencephal, mesocephalon.

mesenchyma (mes-eng'ki-mä), n. [NL.] Same as mesenchyme.

mesenchymal (mes-eng'ki-mal), a. [< mesenchyme + -al.] Pertaining to, consisting of, or derived from mesenchyme; mesenchymatous.

The ordinary mesenchymal cells.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 194.

mesenchymatous (mes-eng-kim'a-tus), a. [< mesenchyma(t-) + -ous.] Same as mesenchymal.

The body-cavity contains mesenchymatous elements.
Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., Feb., 1886, p. 54.

★mesenchyme (mes'eng-kim), n. [< NL. mesenchyma, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἔγχυμα, an infusion.] The tissue or substance of the mesoderm of some animals, as sponges.

mesenna, musenna (mē-, mū-sen'ä), n. [African.] The bark of Albizzia anthelmintica. It is used as a tæniafuge. Also called bisenna, besenna.

mesentera, n. Plural of mesenteron.

mesenteria, n. Plural of mesenterium.

mesenterial (mez-en-tē'ri-al), a. [< mesentery + -al.] Same as mesenteric.

The low development of the mesenterial filament.
Micros. Science, XXVIII. 425.

mesenteric (mez-en-ter'ik), a. [< mesentery + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mesentery, in any sense: as, mesenteric attachment.—Mesenteric artery, an artery which ramifies between the two layers of a mesentery. In man there are two large arteries of this name, superior and inferior, both branches of the abdominal aorta.—Mesenteric chamber, the space between any two mesenteries of an actinozoan.—Mesenteric fever, filaments, ganglia, gland. See the nouns.—Mesenteric lymphatic, a lacteal.—Mesenteric septum. Same as mesentery, 2.—Mesenteric vein, a vein which corresponds to a mesenteric artery.

mesenterica† (mes-en-ter'i-kä), n. [NL., < Gr. μεσεντέριον, the mesentery: see mesentery.] In bot., the mycelium of certain fungi.

mesenteriolum (mes-en-te-rī'ō-lum), n. [NL., dim. of mesenterium, mesentery: see mesentery.] A duplicature of peritoneum connecting the appendix vermiformis with the mesentery.

mesenteritis (mes-en-te-rī'tis), n. [NL., < mesentery + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the mesentery.

mesenterium (mes-en-tē'ri-um), n.; pl. mesenteria (-ä). [NL.: see mesentery.] A mesentery.

★mesenteron (mes-en'tē-ron), n.; pl. mesentera (-rä). [NL. mesenteron, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἔντερον, intestine.] In embryol., the interior of the archenteron or primitive intestine; the intestinal cavity in an early stage, bounded by the hypoblast.

After the formation of the mesoblast and the separation of a portion of the archenteron, the hypoblastic cavity is known as the mesenteron. Stand. Nat. Hist., I. 11.

mesenteronic (mes-en-tē-ron'ik), a. [< mesenteron + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesenteron.

★mesentery (mez'en-ter-i), n.; pl. mesenteries (-iz). [< NL. mesenterium, < Gr. μεσεντέριον, the mesentery, lit. the middle intestine, < μέσος, middle, + ἔντερον, intestine: see enteron.] 1. In anat., a fold or duplicature of peritoneum investing the intestine or other abdominal viscus wholly or in part, and serving to retain such viscus in its proper position in the abdominal cavity. It consists of two layers of peritoneum, separated in that part of their extent which is wrapped around the viscus, in the rest of their extent lying closely apposed, but still having between them the vessels, nerves, and lymphatics which go to the viscus, together with, usually, a quantity of fat. In man the mesentery of the intestine is connected by its root to the spinal column for a distance of about six inches, from the left side of the second lumbar vertebra to the right sacro-iliac synchondrosis; its breadth, or the distance from the vertebræ to the intestinal border, is about four inches. The term mesentery is sometimes restricted to the reflection of peritoneum which keeps the small intestine in position, in which case the similar foldings about other viscera have special names, as mesoarium, mesocæcum, mesocolon, mesoduodenum, mesogastrium, mesometry, mesorchium, mesorectum, mesovarium. See these words. Also mesaraic.

2. In zoöl., some structure like a mesentery; a perivisceral or mesenteric septum. (a) In Actinozoa, one of the several membranous partitions which radiate from the wall of the gastric sac to that of the body vertically across the somatic or perivisceral cavity, which is thus divided into a corresponding number of mesenteric chambers. (b) In sundry other invertebrates, as annelids, one of the membranous or muscular septa which may subdivide the perivisceral cavity into several partly separate chambers.

mesepimeral (mes-e-pim'e-ral), a. [< mesepimeron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesepimeron.

mesepimeron (mes-e-pim'e-ron), n.; pl. mesepimera (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. epimeron, q. v.] In entom., the epimeron of the mesothorax; the epimeral sclerite of the mesopleuron.

mesepisternum (mes-ep-i-stėr'num), n.; pl. mesepisterna (-nä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. episternum, q. v.] In entom., one of the mesothoracic episterna.

meseraic, meseraical. Erroneous forms of mesaraic, mesaraical.

mesethmoid (mes-eth'moid), a. and n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. ethmoid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the mesethmoid.

II. n. The middle ethmoidal bone; the median element of the compound ethmoid bone. It is the part called in human anatomy the lamina perpendicularis, or perpendicular plate of the ethmoid, as distinguished from the lateral masses of that bone, or the ethmoturbinals. See ethmoid.

mesethmoidal (mes-eth-moi'dal), a. [< mesethmoid + -al.] Same as mesethmoid.

★mesh[1] (mesh), n. [Formerly also meash and mash, and dial. mask; < ME. maske, < AS. masc,* transposed max, also dim. mæscre (rare) = MD. masche, maesche, D. maas = MLG. masche = OHG. masca, MHG. G. masche = Icel. möskvi = Sw. maska = Dan. maske, a mesh, net. Cf. W. masg, a mesh, network, mesgl, a mesh; Lith. mazgas, a knot, megsti, knot, weave nets.] 1. One of the clear spaces of a net or netting; an opening in network of a size determined by the distance apart of the knots by which the crossing twines or threads are united; also, a clear space between the threads or wires of a sieve.

Or spreads his subtle nets from sight,
With twinkling glasses, to betray
The larks that in the meshes light.
Dryden, tr. of Horace's Epodes, ii.

2. Figuratively, network; means of entanglement; anything that serves to entangle or constrain: often in the plural: as, the meshes of the law.

A golden mesh to entrap the hearts of men Faster than gnats in cobwebs.
Shak., M. of V., iii. 2. 122.

Breaking the mesh of the bramble fine.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, i.

The home ties that make a web of infinite fineness and soft silken meshes around his heart.
D. G. Mitchell, Reveries of a Bachelor, iv.

3. pl. In lace and similar fabrics, the whole background, often formed of threads very irregularly spaced.—4. In mach., the engagement of the teeth of gearing: as, the mesh of a toothed wheel with the teeth of a rack or with the cogs of another wheel.—5. A tool used in embroidery, knitting, etc., for the production of stitching of regular size, and sometimes having a groove to guide the scissors. Dict. Needlework.

mesh[1] (mesh), v. [Early mod. E. also meash (and mash* ?); < ME. masken, mesh; from the noun: see mesh[1], n. Cf. immesh.] I. trans. 1. To make in meshes; form the meshes of.

Within the loft are many tarry-fingered Penelopes mending old nets and meshing new ones.
Harper's Mag., LXV. 5.

2. To catch in a net, as fish; hence, to entangle; entrap in meshes.

The goodlyhed or beaute which that kynde
In any other lady hadde yset
Kan noght the mountance of a knot unbynde
About his herte, of alle Cryseydes net;
He was so narwe ymasked and yknet.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 1733.

Measshed in the breers, that erst was onely torne.
Wyatt, The Louer that fled Loue.

This fly is caught, is meshed already; I will suck him, and lay him by. Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, iv. 2.

3. To engage (the teeth of wheels or the teeth of a rack and pinion) with each other.

II. intrans. 1. To make meshes or nets.

Net-making . . . is a simple and easily acquired art. . . . A little practice in meshing is sufficient to develop wonderful dexterity of movement. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 359.

2. To become engaged, as the teeth of one wheel with those of another.

A pitman consisting of two grooved bars connected by teeth with each other is combined with a gear wheel on a main shaft meshing into the teeth.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LXI. 73.

mesh[2]†, v. t. An obsolete or dialectal form of mash[1]. Florio.

meshed (mesht), a. [< mesh[1] + -ed[2].] Having meshes; also, decorated with a pattern of crossing lines, resembling the meshes of a net: as, meshed silk.

Small meshed net about 18 inches deep.
Nature, XL. 423.

Meshed work, embroidery on netting, the original form of needle-point lace: common in the seventeenth century.

meshing-net (mesh'ing-net), n. A net in the meshes of which fish are caught by their gills; a gill-net.

mesh-stick (mesh'stik), n. In making nets, a flat slat with rounded ends and angles, about which the thread or twine is netted or looped, and which gages the size of the meshes so that they are of uniform dimensions.

mesh-structure (mesh'struk″tūr), n. In lithol., a sort of network frequently seen in alteration products of minerals, and especially in the commonly occurring change of olivin to serpentine. Also called net-structure and lattice-structure—the latter when the linear arrangement of the products is such as gives rise to lozenge-shaped figures, as in the case of the alterations of hornblende.

meshwork (mesh'wėrk), n. A network; meshes collectively; a web; a plexus; cancellation.

If this Danton were to burst your mesh-work!—Very curious indeed to consider.
Carlyle, French Rev., II. viii. 2.

meshy (mesh'i), a. [< mesh[1] + -y[1].] 1. Formed like network; reticulated.—2. Resembling network; divided into small equal parts.

When all the treasures of the deep Into their meshy cells were poured. J. Baillie.

mesial (mes'i-al or mē'zi-al), a. [< NL. mesialis (formed according to medialis, medial), < Gr. μέσος, middle, mid: see meson.] Pertaining to the middle; being in the middle; in zoöl., pertaining to or on the middle line or plane of the body; median. Also mesian.—Mesial aspect, the aspect of an organ which is toward the mesial plane or meson, as distinguished from its dextral or sinistral aspect.—Mesial line. Same as median line (which see, under median[1]).—Mesial plane, the meson or mesion.

mesially (mes'i- or mē'zi-al-i), adv. Same as mesally.

mesialward (mes'i-al-wärd), adv. [< mesial + -ward.] Same as mesad.

mesian (mes'i-an), a. [< mesi(on) + -an.] Same as mesal or mesial. Barclay.

mesion (mes'i-on), n. [NL. (John Barclay, 1803), < Gr. μέσος, middle: see mesial.] The middle or median longitudinal plane of the body of a bilaterally symmetrical animal, dividing it into equal and similar right and left halves; the meson.

mesistem (mes'is-tem), n. An abbreviation of mesomeristem.

Mesites (me-sī'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. μεσίτης, a mediator, < μέσος, middle: see mesial.] 1. A genus of birds peculiar to Madagascar, type of the family Mesitidæ, presenting a very unusual combination of characters. The general appearance is thrush-like, and there are points about the bird which have caused it to be classed with thrushes, pigeons, gallinaceous birds, rails, herons, etc. The nearest relatives of Mesites are the sun-bitterns (Eurypyga) and the kagus (Rhinochetus). (See cuts under Eurypyga and kagu.) M. variegata is cinnamon-brown varied with black. The genus was founded by Isidore Geoffroy St. Hilaire in 1838. It is also called Mesitornis and Mesœnas.

2. In entom., a genus of beetles of the family Calandridæ, of wide distribution and few species. They abound in Madeira and the Canary Islands, breeding in decaying and dead euphorbias and laurels. Two species occur in the United States, M. subcylindricus and M. ruficollis.

3. A genus of fishes: same as Galaxias. Jenyns, 1842.—4. A genus of Silurian cystoids.

Mesitidæ (me-sit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesites + -idæ.] A family of grallatorial birds, represented by Mesites, and related to the Eurypygidæ and Rhinochetidæ, but not to the Eupetidæ. Also Mesitinæ, as a subfamily of Eupetidæ.

mesitine-spar (mes'i-tin-spär), n. [< mesitine* (< Gr. μεσίτης, a mediator, lit. being in the middle, + -ine[2]) + spar[2].] A carbonate of magnesium and iron intermediate between magnesite and siderite, occurring in yellowish rhombohedral crystals at Traversella in Piedmont.

mesitite (mes'i-tīt), n. [< Gr. μεσίτης, a mediator (lit. being in the middle) (see Mesites), + -ite[2].] Same as mesitine-spar.

mesitule (mes'i-tūl), n. Same as mesityl.

mesityl (mes'i-til), n. [As mesit-ite + -yl.] ★ An organic radical, C_6H_{10}, whose oxid yields acetone by hydrolysis.

mesitylene (mes'i-ti-lēn), n. [< mesityl + -ene.] Trimethyl benzene, an oily, colorless liquid, $C_6H_3(CH_3)_3$, obtained from acetone distilled with half its volume of fuming sulphuric acid. It is a constituent of coal-tar.

mesium (mes'i-um), n.; pl. mesia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle: see meson.] Same as meson, 1. Barclay.

mesjid, n. Same as masjid.

meskeitot, n. See mesquit[1].

meskint, n. Same as maskin.

meskit[1]†, n. Same as mesquit[1].

meskit[2]†, n. See mesquit[2].

meslé (me-lā'), a. [OF., pp. of mesler, mix: see meddle, mell[1].] In her., divided into small parts, paly, bendy, barruly, etc., and alternately a color and a metal.

meslin[1]†, n. and a. Same as maslin[1].

meslin[2], n. See maslin[2].

mesmeree (mez-mėr-ē'), n. [< mesmer(ize) + -ee[1].] The person on whom a mesmerist operates; one who is mesmerized. Imp. Dict.

mesmeric (mez-mer'ik), a. [< Mesmer (see mesmerism) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesmerism; produced by mesmerism, or resembling its effects: as, the mesmeric theory; mesmeric sleep.

Phenomena . . . induced by mesmeric or hypnotic methods. Braid, Trance, p. 31.

Mesmeric lucidity, clairvoyance.

We are especially anxious to witness cases of what is termed mesmeric lucidity or clairvoyance.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, April, 1883, p. vi.

Mesmeric promise. See the quotation.

Some of the cases adduced—as of the so-called mesmeric promise, or impression made on the brain in the mesmeric state, which irresistibly works itself out in the subsequent normal condition—present a singular conformity to some of the best physiological speculations on the mechanism of memory. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 288.

mesmerical (mez-mer'i-kal), a. [< mesmeric + -al.] Same as mesmeric.

mesmerically (mez-mer'i-kal-i), adv. In a mesmeric way; in the manner of or according to Mesmer or mesmerism; by mesmeric means.

mesmerisation, mesmerise, etc. See mesmerization, etc.

mesmerism (mez'mėr-izm), n. [< F. mesmérisme (Sp. Pg. It. mesmerismo); so called from Friedrich Anton (or Franz) Mesmer (1733–1815), a German physician, who propounded the theory in 1778, in Paris.] 1. The doctrine that one person can exercise influence over the mind and nervous system of another, and produce certain phenomena by virtue of a supposed emanation, called animal magnetism, proceeding from him, or simply by the domination of his will over that of the person operated on. Originally Mesmer professed to produce his results by the operation of actual magnets, but all such apparatus has long been abandoned, and those who profess belief in magnetism as the cause of the phenomena exhibited refer it to the body of the mesmerist. The actual phenomena believed to be produced by this so-called animal magnetism are now explained by modern hypnotism, or artificial somnambulism, which within recent years has been the subject of extended research. It is now generally admitted that there is no force of any kind transmitted from the operator to the person operated upon, and many of the pretensions of mesmerism, such as clairvoyance, are rejected. The term mesmerism is still popularly used, often more or less synonymously with hypnotism, but more frequently in its original or an allied sense. Other terms used more or less synonymously with either mesmerism or hypnotism are braidism (after the English surgeon Braid, who first studied the phenomena of mesmerism scientifically), neurypnology, and electrobiology.

By one of my usual processes for reducing the cataleptic state of muscles during hypnotism or mesmerism, I was enabled, in a few seconds, to unlock her jaws and open her mouth. Braid, Trance, p. 59.

2. The influence itself; animal magnetism.

mesmerist (mez'mėr-ist), n. [< mesmer(ize) + -ist.] One who practises mesmerism.

The extravagance of the mesmerists, who have contended for the reality of clairvoyance in some of their patients. Braid, Trance, p. 36.

mesmerization (mez″mėr-i-zā'shon), n. [< mesmerize + -ation.] The act of mesmerizing, or the state of being mesmerized. Also spelled mesmerisation.

mesmerize (mez'mėr-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mesmerized, ppr. mesmerizing. [< mesmer(ism) + -ize.] To practise mesmerism upon; bring into a mesmeric state; hypnotize. Also spelled mesmerise.

The rigidity of the mesmerized fingers could be tested with, if possible, even more certainty than their insensibility, by simply telling the "subject," after a minute of mesmerisation, to close his or her fist.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I. 259.

mesmerizer (mez'mėr-ī-zėr), n. One who mesmerizes; a mesmerist. Also spelled mesmeriser.

mesmeromania (mez″mėr-ō-mā'ni-ä), n. [< mesmer(ism) + mania.] A mania for mesmerism.

"The mesmero-mania," says one doctor in the Medico-Chirurgical Review, "has nearly dwindled in the metropolis into anile fatuity."
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 412, note.

mesmeromaniac (mez″mėr-ō-mā'ni-ak), n. [< mesmeromania + -ac, after maniac.] A person affected with mesmeromania.

mesnality (mē-nal'i-ti), n. Same as mesnalty.

mesnalty (mē'nal-ti), n. [< mesne + -al + -ty. Cf. mesnality.] The manor or estate of a mesne lord.

And the consequence of construing it otherwise would be dangerous to create a mesnalty. But this mesnalty doth not extinct the Lord's tenure, but he may still charge the lands for it, albeit not the person of the tenant.
Welch and Wale, 3 Keble, 554.

mesne (mēn), a. [An archaic spelling of mean[3] (ME. mene, < OF. mesne, etc.), retained in law use.] In law, middle; intervening; intermediate. A mesne lord was a feudal lord who held land of a superior, but had granted a part of it to another person. Thus, he was a tenant to the superior, but lord or superior to the second grantee, and thus his mesne or mediate lord.

They sank from the rank of tenants-in-chief to the rank of mesne tenants.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, IV. 28.

Mesne conveyance. See conveyance.—Mesne encumbrances, encumbrances the right of priority of which is intermediate to the dates of two other encumbrances or titles under consideration.—Mesne process, any process in a suit which intervenes between the original process of writ and the final execution.—Mesne profits, the profits of an estate which accrue to a tenant in possession intermediate between two dates, particularly the commencement and the termination of a possession held without right.

mesoarial (mes-ō-ā'ri-al), a. [< mesoarium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoarium. Encyc. Brit., XII. 660.

mesoarium (mes-ō-ā'ri-um), n.; pl. mesoaria (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος + ᾠάριον, dim. of ᾠόν, egg. Cf. mesovarium.] A fold of the peritoneum forming the mesentery of the ovary or genital gland of some animals, as fishes; a mesovarium.

The genital glands . . . overlie the kidneys, . . . each being suspended by a fold of mesentery (mesoarium).
Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 53.

★ mesoblast (mes'ō-blast), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + βλαστός, a germ.] The middle one of the three germinal layers of any metazoic embryo, between the epiblast and the hypoblast; the mesoderm. It corresponds to the vascular layer of an earlier nomenclature, when the other two layers were called serous and mucous. By far the greater part of the body of a metazoic animal is derived from the mesoblast.

mesoblastema (mes″ō-blas-tē'mä), n.; pl. mesoblastemata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + βλάστημα, a shoot, a sprout: see blastema.] The mass or layer of cells which constitutes the mesoblast; the mesoderm in its early germination.

mesoblastemic (mes″ō-blas-tem'ik), a. [< mesoblastema + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesoblastema: as, mesoblastemic cells or tissue.

mesoblastic (mes-ō-blas'tik), a. [< mesoblast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesoblast: as, a mesoblastic cell; the mesoblastic layer.

mesobranchial (mes-ō-brang'ki-al), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + βράγχια, gills: see branchial.] Overlying the middle of the branchial chambers: applied specifically to a median subdivision of the branchial region of the carapace of a crab, called the mesobranchial lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

mesocæcal (mes-ō-sē'kal), a. [< mesocæcum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesocæcum.

mesocæcum (mes-ō-sē'kum), n.; pl. mesocæca (-kä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. cæcum, q. v.] The mesentery of the cæcum and vermiform appendage; the special peritoneal fold which sometimes holds those parts in place.

mesocarp (mes'ō-kärp), n. [= F. mesocarpe; < NL. mesocarpium, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the middle layer of a pericarp when it is possible to distinguish three dissimilar layers; the sarcocarp. It is the fleshy substance or edible part of fruits which lies between the epicarp and the endocarp. See cuts under drupe and endocarp.

Mesocarpaceæ (mes-ō-kär-pā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesocarpus + -aceæ.] One of the three families of algæ into which the class Conjugatæ is divided. The sexual reproduction is by a process of conjugation, which may be either scalariform (that is, between two or several cells of two different filaments) or lateral (that is, between two adjacent cells of the same filament). The result of this conjugation is the production of a globular zygosperm, which differs from that produced by the Zygnemaceæ in that immediately after its formation it divides into two, three, or more cells, the central one only of which is fertile. United with and included under the Zygnemaceæ by some authors.

Mesocarpus (mes-ō-kär′pus), n. [NL. (Hassall, 1845), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of fresh-water algæ, typical of the family Mesocarpaceæ. The copulation is scalariform, and the spores are spherical or oval, between two cells. This genus is now included under Mongeotia.

mesocephalic (mes-ō-se-fal′ik or -sef′a-lik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head, + -ic.] In craniom., having a skull of medium breadth with a cephalic index of from 75 to 80.

The most characteristic examples of the second great type, the Mongolian or Xanthous or "yellow," have a yellow or brownish complexion; coarse, straight hair, without any tendency to curl, and nearly round in section, on all other parts of the surface except the scalp, scanty and late in appearing; a skull of variable form, mostly mesocephalic. W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 317.

mesocephalism (mes-ō-sef′a-lizm), n. [< mesocephal-ic + -ism.] The character or state of being mesocephalic. Also mesocephaly.

Departures from a width of eight and length of ten (mesocephalism), measured from one auricular aperture over the head to the other, and nose root over the head to the nucha, determine whether the skull shall be considered long. Amer. Nat., XXII. 614.

mesocephalon (mes-ō-sef′a-lon), n.; pl. mesocephala (-lä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head.] Same as mesencephalon.

mesocephalous (mes-ō-sef′a-lus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + κεφαλή, head, + -ous.] Mesocephalic.

mesocephaly (mes-ō-sef′a-li), n. Same as mesocephalism.

mesochil (mes′ō-kil), n. [< NL. mesochilium, q. v.] Same as mesochilium.

mesochilium (mes-ō-kil′i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + χείλος, lip.] The intermediate part of the lip of such orchids as have this organ separated into three distinct parts. Lindley, Treasury of Botany.

mesochoros (me-sok′ō-ros), n. [< Gr. μεσόχορος, standing in mid-chorus, < μέσος, middle, + χορός, chorus.] Same as coryphæus, 1.

mesocœle (mes′ō-sēl), n. Same as mesocœlia.

mesocœlia (mes-ō-sē′li-ä), n.; pl. mesocœliæ (-ē). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + κοιλία, a hollow, ventricle: see cœlia.] The ventricle of the mesencephalon; the mesencephalic cavity of the brain, connecting the diacœlia with the epicœlia; the aqueduct of Sylvius. B. G. Wilder.

mesocœlian (mes-ō-sē′li-an), a. [< mesocœlia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the mesocœlia of the brain.

Mesocœle tubular; mesocœlian roof quadrilobate. Amer. Nat., XXI. 914.

mesocolic (mes-ō-kol′ik), a. [< mesocolon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesocolon: as, a mesocolic peritoneal fold; mesocolic attachment.

mesocolon (mes-ō-kō′lon), n. [NL., < Gr. μεσόκολον, less prop. μεσόκωλον, the part of the mesentery next the colon, < μέσος, middle, + κόλον, the colon: see colon[2].] The mesentery of the colon; the peritoneal fold which holds the colon in place.

mesocoracoid (mes-ō-kor′a-koid), a. and n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. coracoid.] I. a. Situated between the hypercoracoid and the hypocoracoid.

II. n. An element in the shoulder-girdle of teleost fishes, disintegrated from the coracoid or paraglenal cartilage, and intermediate between or bridging over the hypercoracoid and hypocoracoid. It is developed in the malacopterygian and plectospondylous fishes, but is lost in the acanthopterygians.

mesocuneiform (mes-ō-kū′nē-i-fôrm), n. and a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. cuneiform.] I. n. In anat. and zoöl., the middle one of the three cuneiform bones of the tarsus, lying between the ectocuneiform and the entocuneiform. It is in special relation with the head of the second metatarsal bone. Also called mesosphenoid.

II. a. Middle, as a cuneiform bone; pertaining to the mesocuneiform.

mesode (mes′ōd), n. [< Gr. μεσῳδός, a mesode (see def.), < μέσος, middle, + ἀείδειν, ᾄδειν, sing, > ᾠδή, a song, ode: see ode.] In anc. pros., a system of metrically different composition intervening between a strophe and its antistrophe. See epode.

mesoderm (mes′ō-dėrm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, skin.] 1. The middle germinal layer of the three-layered embryo of any metazoic animal, lying between the endoderm and the ectoderm. The term is used synonymously with mesoblast, the correlation being endoderm, mesoderm, and ectoderm; hypoblast, mesoblast, and epiblast; or mucous, vascular, and serous layers. Most of the body of every metazoan animal is derived from the mesoderm. When the embryo becomes four-layered, as it usually does, this state results from the splitting of the mesoderm into an inner visceral and an outer parietal layer, called respectively splanchnopleural and somatopleural, or involuntomotory and voluntomotory.

2. In bot., the middle layer of tissue in the shell of the spore-case of an urn-moss.

mesodermal (mes′ō-dėr-mal), a. [< mesoderm + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoderm in plants or animals; having a middle germinal layer.

Mesodermalia (mes″ō-dėr-mā′li-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέρμα, skin.] Spongiozoa or Porifera regarded as a prime division of the grade Cœlentera, whose archenteron is a branching canal-system communicating with the outer water by a set of inhalent and exhalent pores; the sponges: opposed to Epithelaria, or all other cœlenterates collectively. R. von Lendenfeld.

mesodermalian (mes″ō-dėr-mā′li-an), a. and n. [< Mesodermalia + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Mesodermalia, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Mesodermalia.

mesodermic (mes-ō-dėr′mik), a. [< mesoderm + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a mesoderm or middle germinating layer; mesodermal.

And so form the foundation of the mesodermic investment by which the body cavity of the adult is lined. A. Sedgwick, Micros. Science, XXVII. 499.

★ Mesodesma (mes-ō-des′mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + δέσμα, a band: see desma.] A genus of wedge-shells of the family Donacidæ, or made type of a family Mesodesmidæ, having a thick solid trigonal shell with two short stout lateral teeth, and the cartilage internal. Species abound in the Australian region.

Mesodesma glabratum— right valve.

Mesodesmidæ (mes-ō-des′mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesodesma + -idæ.] A family of bivalve mollusks, named from the genus Mesodesma. J. E. Gray, 1840.

Donacilla chilensis, one of the Mesodesmidæ— right valve.

mesodic (me-sod′ik), a. [< mesode + -ic.] In anc. pros., constituting or pertaining to a colon, line, or system of a different length or metrical character interposed between two cola, two sets of uniform lines, or two systems of identical metrical form; especially, constituting, pertaining to, or containing a system of different form intervening between a strophe and its antistrophe. See epodic, palinodic, periodic, proödic.

mesodont (mes′ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. In anthropol., having medium-sized teeth: as, the mesodont races.—2. In zoöl., pertaining to the Mesodonta, or having their characters.

Mesodonta (mes-ō-don′tä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A group of extinct mammals of North America, resembling Insectivora, characterized by Cope as a suborder of Bunotheria, having the incisors not growing from persistent pulps, the molars tubercular and never sectorial, the third trochanter apparently elevated, and the astragalus not grooved above. Ten Eocene genera are referred to this group.

mesoduodenal (mes-ō-dū-ō-dē′nal), a. [< mesoduodenum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoduodenum.

mesoduodenum (mes-ō-dū-ō-dē′num), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. duodenum, q. v.] The fold of peritoneum which incloses and supports the duodenum; the duodenal mesentery.

mesogaster (mes-ō-gas′tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γαστήρ, belly.] 1. An intermediate part of the intestine, extending from the pylorus to the cæcum, and including the small intestine with its annexes, as the liver and pancreas, also, in the fetus, the umbilical vesicle. It is commonly called the mid-gut.—2. [cap.] A genus of fossil fishes. Agassiz.

mesogastral (mes-ō-gas′tral), a. [< mesogaster + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesogaster.

mesogastric (mes-ō-gas′trik), a. [< mesogastrium + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the mesogastrium; umbilical, as a region of the abdomen; mesenteric with reference to the stomach or to the mesogaster.—2. In Crustacea, situated in the middle of the gastric lobe of the carapace: specifically applied to a median subdivision of that lobe, the mesogastric lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

mesogastrium (mes-ō-gas′tri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γαστήρ, belly.] 1. In human anat., the umbilical region of the abdomen, between the epigastrium above and the hypogastrium or epipubic region below. See cut under abdomen.—2. In anat. and zoöl., the mesentery of the stomach; the fold of peritoneum which holds the stomach in place. It is a portion of the common intestinal mesentery, in early fetal life indistinguishable therefrom, but afterward variously modified.

mesogenous (me-soj′e-nus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + -γενης, born, produced: see -genous.] Increasing by growth at or from the middle, as the spores of certain fungi. [Rare.]

mesoglœa (mes-ō-glē′ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + γλοία, γλοιά, glue: see glue.] 1. The mesodermal intercellular substance, or ground-substance, of some animals, as sponges and other cœlenterates. R. von Lendenfeld, Proc. Zoöl. Soc., London, 1886, p. 566.—2. [cap.] A genus of gelatinous seaweeds, included under the Chordariaceæ, with olive-brown branching filiform fronds. The unilocular sporangia are oval in shape and borne at the base of peripheral filaments; plurilocular sporangia unknown. Also Mesogloia. Agardh, 1817.

Mesoglœaceæ (mes″ō-glē-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kuetzing, 1843), < Mesoglœa + -aceæ.] A former family of olive-green seaweeds with a gelatinous or cartilaginous thallus of hemispherical or cylindrical outline, forming small gelatinous or slimy cushions or branching tufts on other larger seaweeds. Now included, with many other genera, under the Chordariaceæ.

mesoglœal (mes-ō-glē′al), a. [< mesoglœa + -al.] Consisting of or resembling the brown seaweed Mesoglœa.

mesoglutæus (mes″ō-glō-tē′us), n.; pl. mesoglutæi (-ī). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. glutæus, q. v.] The middle gluteal muscle; the glutæus medius.

mesogluteal (mes″ō-glō-tē′al), a. [< mesoglutæus + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoglutæus.

mesognathic (mes-og-nath′ik), a. Same as mesognathous.

mesognathous (me-sog′nā-thus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + γνάθος, jaw.] 1. Having a moderate or intermediate gnathic index of from 98 to 103, as a skull.—2. Having a skull thus characterized, as a person.

mesognathy (me-sog′nā-thi), n. [As mesognathous + -y.] That character of a skull or person in which the jaws are moderately prominent anteriorly, indicated by a gnathic index of from 98 to 103.

Mesohippus (mes-ō-hip′us), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ἵππος, a horse.] A genus of very small three-toed horses, of the family Equidæ, founded by Marsh in 1875 upon remains from the early Miocene of North America. The animal was about as large as a sheep, with three functional digits on each foot, and an additional splint-bone on each of the fore feet. Probably same as Anchitherium.

mesolabe (mes′ō-lāb), n. [< L. mesolabium, < Gr. μεσολάβιον, prop. μεσόλαβον, μεσόλαβος, an instrument invented by Eratosthenes for finding mean proportional lines, < μέσος, middle, mean (neut. pl. μέσα, mean terms), + λαμβάνειν, √ λαβ, take. Cf. astrolabe.] A mechanical contrivance for geometrically extracting the roots of quantities. It consists of a number of equal rectangles, each having a diagonal marked, and all capable of sliding along a line common to the bases of all, so that they partially overlap one another. The marked diagonals are all parallel. To use the instrument, all the intersections, each formed of the diagonal of one rectangle and the overlapping edge of the next one, are brought, by the sliding along of the rectangles, into one straight line with one extremity of the diagonal of the uppermost rectangle and a point on the exposed edge of the lowermost whose distance from the extremity of the diagonal on the same edge measures the quantity whose root is to be extracted. Then the corresponding distance on the uppermost rectangle is the root multiplied by that of the common altitude of the rectangles, which last is supposed to be known. The exponent of the root is equal to the number of rectangles employed. The mesolabe was invented by Eratosthenes, about 200 to 250 years before Christ.

mesole (mes′ōl), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle (?).] See thomsonite.

mesolite (mes′ō-līt), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + λίθος, stone.] A zeolitic mineral resembling scolecite, but containing both calcium and sodium.

mesolobar (mes′ō-lō-bär), a. [< mesolobe + -ar[2].] Of or pertaining to the mesolobe; callosal: as, mesolobar arteries. [Rare.]

mesolobe (mes′ō-lōb), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + λοβός, lobe: see lobe.] The callosum or corpus callosum of the brain; the great commissure of the cerebral hemispheres. [Rare or obsolete.]

mesologarithm (mes-ō-log′a-riᵺm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. logarithm.] A logarithm of the cosine or cotangent. Kepler.

mesological (mes-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< mesolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to mesology; relating to the medium in which an organism exists.

Grapes contain the mineral salts in variable quantity, the proportion depending on the variety of grape and on mesological conditions.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, III. 382.

mesology (me-sol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of human knowledge concerning the relations of an organism to its environment.

mesomeristem (mes-ō-mer′is-tem), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. meristem.] The innermost of the two layers into which the exomeristem is divided. The exomeristem is the thickening-ring which surrounds the axial strand (primary pith of Sanio) or pith-cylinder of the nascent shoots or branches of plants. It is divided into two layers, the mesomeristem, which gives rise to the vascular bundles, and the perimeristem, which gives rise to the external cortex and the dermatogen.

mesometric (mes-ō-met′rik), a. [< mesometry + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a mesometry or mesometrium: as, mesometric folds of peritoneum.

mesometritis (mes″ō-mē-trī′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + μήτρα, the womb, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle or muscular coat of the uterus. Compare metritis.

mesometrium (mes-ō-mē′tri-um), n.; pl. mesometria (-ä). Same as mesometry.

mesometry (me-som′e-tri), n.; pl. mesometries (-triz). [< NL. mesometrium, < Gr. μέσος, middle, intermediate, + μήτρα, the womb: see matrix.] The mesentery of the womb or its annexes; a peritoneal fold, holding in place the uterus or an oviduct. The broad ligament of the human uterus is a mesometry. Corresponding duplications of peritoneum acquire special characters in different cases.

It [the oviduct of a bird] is supported by peritoneal folds forming a mesometry, like the mesentery of the intestines. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 221.

Mesomphalia (mes-om-fā′li-ä), n. [NL. (Hope, 1838), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὀμφαλός, the navel.] A genus of beetles of the family Chrysomelidæ. They are almost exclusively South American, there being over 200 such species, as against one in North America. M. conspersa is a South American species with peaked elytra, of a blackish-green color punctured with velvety black spots, and burnished with six larger golden-haired spots.

Mesomyodi (mes″ō-mī-ō′dī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + μῦς, muscle, + ᾠδή, song.] A suborder or other prime division of Passeres, in which the syrinx is mesomyodian; non-melodious or songless passerine birds: distinguished from Acromyodi.

mesomyodian (mes″ō-mī-ō′di-an), a. [As Mesomyodi + -ian.] Having the intrinsic syringeal muscles attached to the middle part of the upper bronchial rings.

Syrinx with less than four distinct pairs of intrinsic muscles inserted at the middle of the upper bronchial half-ring, representing the mesomyodian type of voice-organ. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 427.

mesomyodous (mes″ō-mī-ō′dus), a. [As Mesomyodi + -ous.] Same as mesomyodian.

meson (mes′on), n. [< Gr. μέσον, the middle, neut. of μέσος = L. medius, middle: see medium, mid[1].] 1. The median plane which divides a body into two equal and symmetrical parts; the vertical longitudinal middle plane, dividing the body into right and left halves. Every median line lies in the meson. The dorsal border of the meson is called the dorsimeson; the ventral, ventrimeson. Also mesium. See median[1], a.

The meson, mesal, or median plane is an imaginary longitudinal plane extending from the dorsal surface of the body to the ventral surface, and dividing the body into right and left symmetrical halves.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 536.

2. See tetrachord.

mesondeut, mesondieut, n. See measondue.

mesonephric (mes-ō-nef′rik), a. [< mesonephr-on + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesonephros.

The mesonephric tubules extend gradually from behind forwards till they come in contact with the pronephros.
Micros. Science, XXIX. 135.

mesonephron (mes-ō-nef′ron), n.; pl. mesonephra (-rä). [NL.: see mesonephros.] Same as mesonephros.

mesonephros (mes-ō-nef′ros), n.; pl. mesonephroi (-roi). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + νεφρός, kidney: see nephritis.] The Wolffian body proper; the central or intermediate part of the segmental organs or primitive renal organs of the embryo, between the pronephros and the metanephros, whose duct is the Wolffian duct: distinguished from pronephros and metanephros.

mesonotal (mes-ō-nō′tal), a. [< mesonotum + -al.] Situated on the mesonotum; of or pertaining to the mesonotum.

mesonotum (mes-ō-nō′tum), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + νῶτος, the back.] The middle one of the three divisions of the notum of an insect, succeeding the pronotum and preceding the metanotum; the dorsal division of the mesothorax; the upper part of the middle thoracic segment. It consists typically of four sclerites, called præscutum, scutum, scutellum, and postscutellum, which may or may not be distinguishable by means of sutures between them. In Hymenoptera, Lepidoptera, and Diptera it is very large, forming the principal part of the upper surface of the thorax: in these insects its divisions are usually named without the prefix meso-. In insects having wing-covers the mesonotum is generally concealed by them, except a piece called the scutellum, which may be very small, as in most Coleoptera, or large, as in many Hemiptera.

Mesonychidæ (mes-ō-nik′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesonyx + -idæ.] A family of mammals having as type the genus Mesonyx.

Mesonyx (mes′ō-niks), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὄνυξ (ὀνυχ-), nail: see onyx.] A genus of fossil carnivorous mammals, based by Cope in 1873 upon remains from the Eocene beds of Wyoming. It represents a generalized type supposed by Cope to have some relationship with existing seals. The animal had flat blunt claws and a long slender tail.

mesoparapteral (mes″ō-pa-rap′te-ral), a. [< mesoparapter-on + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoparapteron.

mesoparapteron (mes″ō-pa-rap′te-ron), n.; pl. mesoparaptera (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. parapteron: see parapteron.] The parapteron of the mesothoracic segment; the third sclerite of the mesopleuron.

mesophlebitis (mes″ō-flē-bī′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φλέψ (φλεβ-), a vein, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the middle coat of a vein.

mesophlœum (mes-ō-flē′um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φλοιός, bark.] In bot., the middle or green layer of bark.

mesophragm (mes′ō-fram), n. [NL.: see mesophragma.] Same as mesophragma.

mesophragma (mes-ō-frag′mä), n.; pl. mesophragmata (-ma-tä). [< NL. mesophragma, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φράγμα, partition: see diaphragm.] 1. In entom., a transverse internal partition, descending from the anterior border of the metathorax above, between the mesothorax and the metathorax, and serving for the attachment of muscles. It probably corresponds to the metapræscutum; it is often absent.—2. In Crustacea, that process of an endosternite (or intersternal apodeme) which is directed inward to unite with its fellow and form an arch over the sternal canal. See sternal canal, under sternal.

mesophragmal (mes-ō-frag′mal), a. [< mesophragm + -al.] Pertaining to the mesophragm.

mesophyl, mesophyll (mes′ō-fil), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φύλλον, a leaf.] The parenchymatous tissue which lies between the epidermal layers of a flat leaf-lamina; the soft inner tissue of leaves.

mesophyllum (mes-ō-fil′um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φύλλον, leaf.] Same as mesophyl.

mesophytum (me-sof′i-tum), n.; pl. mesophyta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + φυτόν, a plant.] In bot., the line of junction between either the node and the base of the petiole or the stem-base and root. [Obsolete.]

mesopic (me-sop′ik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὤψ (ὠπ-) face.] Having a nasomalar index of from 107.5 to 110, as the negroid races; having small and moderately retreating malar bones: as, a mesopic face.

mesoplast (mes′ō-plast), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, mold.] Nuclear protoplasm; endoplast; a cell-nucleus.

mesoplastic (mes-ō-plas′tik), a. [< mesoplast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to mesoplast.

mesoplastral (mes-ō-plas′tral), a. [< mesoplastron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoplastron.

In the Pleurodira the first two families are distinguished from one another by the presence or absence of a mesoplastral bone. Nature, XL. 7.

mesoplastron (mes-ō-plas′tron), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. plastron.] A median and anterior bone or plate of the plastron developed in certain of the pleurodirous tortoises.

mesopleural (mes-ō-plö′ral), a. [< mesopleuron + -al.] In entom., intermediate and lateral, as a part of the mesothorax; of or pertaining to the mesopleuron.

mesopleuron (mes-ō-plö′ron), n.; pl. mesopleura (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πλευρόν, a rib: see pleura.] The lateral or pleural part of the mesothorax of an insect; a mesothoracic pleuron, following the propleuron and preceding the metapleuron. Each mesopleuron, right and left, is divided into three sclerites—an episternum, an epimeron, and a parapteron.

Mesoplodon (me-sop′lō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὅπλα, arms, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of cetaceans having a single large tooth on each side of the lower jaw.

mesoplodont (me-sop′lō-dont), a. [< Mesoplodon(t-).] Armed with a tooth in the middle of each side of the lower jaw: said specifically of whales of the genus Mesoplodon.

mesopodia, n. Plural of mesopodium.

mesopodial (mes-ō-pō′di-al), a. and n. [< mesopodium + -al.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the mesopodium of a mollusk.—2. Of or pertaining to the mesopodialia.

II. n. A mesopodial bone; one of the mesopodialia.

mesopodialia (mes-ō-pō-di-ā′li-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Marsh, 1880): see mesopodium.] The bones of the carpus and tarsus, taken together, as mutually corresponding, and as forming morphological segments of the limbs intervening between the epipodialia and the metapodialia. See epipodialia.

mesopodium (mes-ō-pō′di-um), n.; pl. mesopodia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] The middle one of the three parts into which the foot of some mollusks, as gastropods and pteropods, may be divided, between the propodium and the metapodium. See epipodium.

mesopostscutellar (mes″ō-post-skū′te-lär), a. [< mesopostscutellum + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to the mesopostscutellum.

mesopostscutellum (mes-ō-post-skū-tel′um), n.; pl. mesopostscutella (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. postscutellum, q. v.] The postscutellum of the mesonotum; the postscutellar sclerite of the mesothorax.

Mesopotamian (mes″ō-pō-tā′mi-an), a. [< Mesopotamia, < Gr. Μεσοποταμία, Mesopotamia (see def.), lit. 'the land between the rivers,' < μέσος, middle, + ποταμός, river.] Pertaining to Mesopotamia, the region between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates in Asia, north of Babylonia. The name is sometimes extended to include Babylonia also.—Mesopotamian art, a convenient general name including the kindred arts of ancient Chaldea, Babylonia, and Assyria—though these arts were not definitely limited to Mesopotamia proper. They constitute together one of the chief divisions of art development, and exerted an important influence upon Greek art, and hence upon succeeding arts for all time. See Assyrian, Babylonian, and Chaldean.

mesopræscutal (mes″ō-prē-skū′tal), a. [< mesopræscutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesopræscutum.

mesopræscutum (mes″ō-prē-skū′tum), n.; pl. mesopræscuta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. præscutum, q. v.] The præscutum of the mesothoracic segment of an insect.

mesoprosopic (mes-ō-prō-sop′ik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + πρόσωπον, face.] In craniom., intermediate between chamæprosopic and leptoprosopic—that is, with a face of moderate width; with a facial index of about 90.

mesopsyche (mes-op-sī′kē), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ψυχή, spirit.] Haeckel's name for the midbrain or mesencephalon.

mesopterygial (mes-op-te-rij′i-al), a. [< mesopterygium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesopterygium.

mesopterygium (mes-op-te-rij′i-um), n.; pl. mesopterygia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, +

NL. pterygium.] The middle one of several basal cartilages which the pterygium of a fish, as an elasmobranch, may present, between the propterygium and the metapterygium. See ★ pterygium.

mesopterygoid (mes-op-ter'i-goid), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. pterygoid, q. v.] That part of the pterygoid which in birds articulates with the palatal bone or with the basipterygoid process of the sphenoid, or with both.

mesopycni (mes-ō-pik'nī), n. pl. [ML., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + πυκνόν, a small interval in music, neut. of πυκνός, close.] In medieval music, modes based upon a tetrachord having its half-step in the middle.

mesorchial (mes-ôr'ki-al), a. [< mesorchium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesorchium.

mesorchium (mes-ôr'ki-um), n.; pl. mesorchia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ὄρχις, a testicle.] In anat., the fold of peritoneum supporting the testis while in the abdomen, or as it descends into the scrotal sac.

mesorectal (mes-ō-rek'tal), a. [< mesorectum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesorectum.

mesorectum (mes-ō-rek'tum), n.; pl. mesorecta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. rectum, q. v.] The mesentery of the rectum; the fold of peritoneum which is reflected over part of the rectum, holding this gut in place.

mesoretina (mes-ō-ret'i-nä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. retina, q. v.] The middle stratum, or mosaic layer, of the retina, composed of the rod and cone and nuclear layers. J. Leidy, Anat., 1889.

mesorhinal (mes-ō-rī'nal), a. [< mesorhine + -al.] Internasal; internarial; situated between the nostrils: said specifically of the mesorhinium.

mesorhine (mes'ō-rin), a. [Properly mesorrhine (cf. Gr. μεσόρριν, having a middling nose), < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), nose.] Having an index ranging from 48 to 53 (Broca), or 47–51 (German anthropologists): applied to the nose.

Nose small, mesorhine or leptorhine. W. H. Flower.

★ mesorhinian (mes-ō-rin'i-an), a. [< mesorhine + -ian.] Same as mesorhine. Nature, XXXV. 357.

mesorhinium (mes-ō-rin'i-um), n.; pl. mesorhinia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), the nose.] In ornith., the part of a bird's beak which is situated between the external nostrils; the basal or internarial part of the culmen. In some birds it runs up on the forehead, magnified or otherwise diversified, giving rise to the frontal shield or casque. See cuts at antiæ and shield.

mesoscapula (mes-ō-skap'ū-lä), n.; pl. mesoscapulæ (-lē). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. scapula, q. v.] The spine of the scapula, considered as a median element of that bone. W. K. Parker.—Delta mesoscapulæ. See delta.

mesoscapular (mes-ō-skap'ū-lär), a. [< mesoscapula + -ar[3].] Of or relating to the mesoscapula.

At the scapular extremity of the clavicle there is often a piece of cartilage, considered to be segmented off from the end of the mesoscapula, and hence called mesoscapular segment. W. H. Flower.

mesoscuta, n. Plural of mesoscutum.

mesoscutal (mes-ō-skū'tal), a. [< mesoscutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesoscutum.

mesoscutellar (mes-ō-skū'te-lär), a. Of or pertaining to the mesoscutellum.

mesoscutellum (mes″ō-skū-tel'um), n.; pl. mesoscutella (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. scutellum, q. v.] In entom., the scutellum of the mesonotum.

mesoscutum (mes-ō-skū'tum), n.; pl. mesoscuta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. scutum, q. v.] In entom., the scutum of the mesonotum; the scutal sclerite of the mesothorax.

★ mesoseme (mes'ō-sēm), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σῆμα, a sign, mark, token.] In anthrop., having a medium index; specifically, in craniom., having an orbital index between 83 and 89 (Broca), between 84 and 89 (Flower), or from 80 to 85 (German anthropologists).

Mesosemia (mes-ō-sē'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σῆμα, a mark.] A genus of butterflies of the family Erycinidæ.

mesosiderite (mes-ō-sid'e-rīt), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σιδηρίτης, of iron: see siderite.] A name given by G. Rose (1864) to one of three subdivisions made by him in the classification of meteoric irons, these divisions being founded on the comparative amount of iron and stony matter present. As defined by Brezina, in one of the most recent systematic classifications of the meteorites, mesosiderite is a network of iron inclosing olivin and bronzite with more or less plagioclase, these minerals having so coarsely crystalline a texture that the characteristic structure is obscured. It forms a passage from the iron to the chondrites. The meteorite which fell at Estherville, Iowa, in 1879 is of this class. See meteorite.

mesosigmoid (mes-ō-sig'moid), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. sigmoid.] The mesentery of the sigmoid flexure of the intestine, between the mesocolon and the mesorectum.

mesosoma (mes-ō-sō'mä), n.; pl. mesosomata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σῶμα, the body.] In lamellibranchiate mollusks, a middle region of the body, which gives rise to the foot and is situated between the prosoma and the metasoma.

mesosomatic (mes″ō-sō-mat'ik), a. [< mesosoma(t-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesosoma of a mollusk.

mesosperm (mes'ō-spėrm), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., a membrane of a seed; the secundine, or second membrane from the surface.

★ mesospore (mes'ō-spōr), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σπόρος, seed.] The middle coat or layer of a spore when it is possible to distinguish three layers.

mesosporic (mes-ō-spō'rik), a. [< mesospore + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesospore.

mesostaphyline (mes-ō-staf'i-lin), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + σταφυλή, the uvula.] In craniom., intermediate between leptostaphyline and brachystaphyline — that is, with a palate of median width; having a palatal index of from 71 to 77 (Broca), or 80 to 85 (German anthropologists).

mesostate (mes'ō-stāt), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. state.] In biol., an intermediate substance or product in a series of metabolic changes.

We are thus led to the conception that the specific material of a secretion, such as the trypsin of pancreatic juice, comes from the protoplasm of the cell, through a number of intermediate substances, or mesostates as they are called. M. Foster, Encyc. Brit., XIX. 19.

mesosterna, n. Plural of mesosternum.

mesosternal (mes-ō-stėr'nal), a. [< mesosternum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the mesosternum: as, a mesosternal sternite.

mesosterneber (mes-ō-stėr'ne-bėr), n. [< NL. mesosternebra, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. sternebra, sterneber: see sterneber.] Any one of the intermediate sternebers or pieces of the breast-bone which intervene between the manubrium of the sternum and the xiphoid or ensiform appendage. There are usually several such bones in mammals and various reptiles, as the four composing the gladiolus in man.

mesosternebra (mes-ō-stėr'ne-brä), n.; pl. mesosternebræ (-brē). [NL.] Same as mesosterneber.

mesosternebral (mes-ō-stėr'ne-bral), a. [< mesosterneber + -al.] Pertaining to a mesosterneber.

mesosternum (mes-ō-stėr'num), n.; pl. mesosterna (-nä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. sternum, q. v.] 1. In anat., the piece or pieces of a breast-bone which has several segments lying between the presternum and the xiphisternum: said chiefly of the segmented sternum of mammals. In man it is the gladiolus or body of the sternum proper, as distinguished from the manubrium and the xiphoid cartilage.

2. In entom., the ventral or sternal sclerite of the mesothorax; the under side of the mesothorax, opposite the mesonotum.

Sternum of Pig, showing ms, mesosternum or gladiolus; ps, presternum or manubrium; xs, xiphisternum, or xiphoid appendage.

mesostethium (mes-ō-stē'thi-um), n.; pl. mesostethia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + στῆθος, the breast.] In entom., the metasternum, or large piece between the bases of the middle and the posterior legs. It is conspicuous in beetles. Kirby.

mesostylous (mes-ō-stī'lus), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + στῦλος, a pillar: see style[2].] Same as mid-styled. See heterostylism.

Mesosuchia (mes-ō-sū'ki-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + σοῦχος, a crocodile (a local name in Egypt).] A division of crocodiles having amphicœlous vertebræ: contrasted with Eusuchia and Parasuchia.

mesosuchian (mes-ō-sū'ki-an), a. [< Mesosuchia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Mesosuchia.

Crocodilians have developed into the Mesosuchian type. Günther, Encyc. Brit., XX. 465.

mesosuchious (mes-ō-sū'ki-us), a. [< Mesosuchia + -ous.] Same as mesosuchian.

mesotarsus (mes-ō-tär'sus), n.; pl. mesotarsi (-sī). [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. tarsus, q. v.] In entom., the whole tarsus of the second or middle leg of a six-footed insect, coming between the metatarsus of the hind leg and the protarsus of the fore leg.

mesothelial (mes-ō-thē'li-al), a. [< mesothelium + -al.] Of or pertaining to mesothelium.

mesothelium (mes-ō-thē'li-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + NL. (epi)thelium, q. v.] The epithelium lining the entire primitive cœlom or body-cavity of the embryo; the cœlarium.

Mesotheriidæ (mes″ō-thē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mesotherium + -idæ.] A family of extinct quadrupeds from the Pliocene of South America, representing a very generalized type, allied on the one hand to the rodents and by some made a suborder, Hebetidentati, of Rodentia, by others referred to the Subungulata or polydactyl ungulates. There are clavicles, as in no other known ungulates, and four lower incisors, as in no known rodents; the mandibular condyle is transverse, and the maxillaries articulate with the nasals. There are in each upper half-jaw 1 incisor, no canines, 2 premolars, and 3 molars, and in each lower half jaw 2 incisors, no canines, 1 premolar, and 3 molars — in all, 24 teeth.

Mesotherium (mes-ō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + θήριον, a wild beast.] A genus of fossil rodent-like ungulate quadrupeds, typical of the family Mesotheriidæ, upon which is based the prime division Hebetidentati. M. cristatum is the type species. Typotherium is a synonym.

mesotherm (mes'ō-thėrm), n. [= F. mésotherme, < Gr. μέσος, middle, + θερμός, hot, θέρμη, heat.] In Alphonse de Candolle's classification of plants with regard to their geographical distribution, a plant of his third "physiological group." The plants of this group require a moderate degree of heat, from 15° to 20° C. They are very numerous, including most of the plants of the warmer parts of the temperate zones of both hemispheres exclusive of the mountainous districts.

mesothesis (me-soth'e-sis), n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + θέσις, a putting, proposition: see thesis.] Middle place; mean. [Rare.]

Imitation is the mesothesis of likeness and difference. Coleridge.

mesothoracic (mes″ō-thō-ras'ik), a. [< mesothorax (-ac-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the mesothorax of an insect.—Mesothoracic case. Same as mesothoracotheca.

mesothoracotheca (mes-ō-thō″ra-kō-thē'kä), n.; pl. mesothoracothecæ (-sē). [NL., < mesothorax (-ac-) + Gr. θήκη, a case.] In entom., the mesothoracic case, or that part of the integument of a pupa covering the mesothorax. In the Lepidoptera and Diptera the other thoracic cases are indistinguishable from this, and it is then called the thoracotheca.

mesothorax (mes-ō-thō'raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + θώραξ, chest: see thorax.] In entom., the second or middle one of the three divisions of the thorax, situated between the prothorax and the metathorax, and bearing the second pair of legs and the first pair of wings. When very large, as in dipterous insects, it is simply called the thorax.

Mesothorax, shaded, between prothorax (a) and metathorax (b); c, head; d, two abdominal segments.
